WORLD DIET

A GOOD index of a country's standard of living is the amount of fat that is eaten. More fats are added to the diet as the level of prosperity rises and saturation point has probably not been reached anywhere, not even in the United States of America. It is reckoned by the United Nations that annual fat consumption is less than 8 lb. a head in countries where the people have an average income of under $100 and rises to 42 lb. a head when the income is over $500. Climatic conditions count, for the human body needs less fuel and, therefore, less fat in the tropics than elsewhere, but wide variations within the same climatic zone can be explained only by differences in the standard of living. In Britain we are eating more fat than before the war, taking butter, margarine, lard and cooking-fat together. The consumption of the choicest kind, butter, has gone down by one-third and according to Major Lloyd George, the Minister of Food, we must face the fact that butter is rapidly becoming something like a luxury food.

At the recent annual general meeting of Unilever, Limited, Sir Geoffrey Heyworth declared that in choosing between butter and margarine the consumer need not worry about any difference in nutritional value. In the United Kingdom and Holland, as in most other countries, margarine is enriched with vitamins A and D to a content about equal to that in butter. But many people do prefer the flavour of butter to that of margarine, and if there were a quite inadequate supply of butter there would always be some people who would be prepared to pay an exorbitant price for it. Taste does matter, and indeed one of the most valuable attributes of oils and fats is that they make meals more palatable. This is something that cannot be measured exactly in the way that research workers can calculate that oils and fats provide the body with heat and energy, prolong the staying power of meals, assist easy digestion and promote the growth of young people.

If edible fats are so important and demand goes on increasing steadily, the need for the most efficient use of land in producing fats will become more and more obvious. It is, as Sir Geoffrey Heyworth says, a startling thought that crops when fed to animals lose at least two-thirds of their calorific value before they emerge in the form of meat and milk. Hence the development of the oil palm in the equatorial forest areas of South America, Africa and South-East Asia, where it is always hot and wet, becomes extremely important for the people of Western Europe. With the relentless increase in the population of the world in relation to the available arable and pasture land it will be more and more necessary to use land to yield the maximum amount of nutrition, even though the diet may become less varied and pleasant.

The world's increasing need of milk and cheese, as also the preference that many people have for butter, will ensure the dairy farmer's continued prosperity. Welcome news comes from New Zealand that butter fat production has been a record for the past season, with a total of 500 million lb. The Dominion has made slightly more butter and slightly less cheese because there has been a change-over from cheese to casein production, and cream from whole milk supplied to the casein factories is diverted to butter manufacture. In Britain we rely on New Zealand to maintain even our present meagre butter ration. We make little butter at home and milk that is surplus to the liquid demand is rightly being put first to cheese-making. No doubt if the Milk Marketing Board regain their powers next spring there will still be the obligation under Government direction to give first priority in manufacture to cheese-making. Cream and milk used for chocolate manufacture are more profitable outlets, but cheese is more essential in the national diet and so far as spreadable fats are concerned we shall continue willy-nilly to rely more on margarine. We cannot be choosers in this matter.

COWS

WHEN George the cowman brings the cows along

He wears a sack on days of driving rain,
Thinks his slow thoughts on why the world's gone wrong,

And wishes yesterday were here again;
Wrinkled and brown as any winter day
George the old cowman plods upon his way.

When Jean the landgirl takes the cows to milk
She whistles to the ducks upon the pond,
Whistles her thoughts of gossamer and silk,
Her dreams of happy years that lie beyond;
Striding along, tossing her rain-dark hair,
Jean, the young landgirl, goes without a care.

Drive them who will, the cows come calmly home,
Whisking rope tails, crowding the narrow space

With heaving flanks, legs splashed with dung and loam,

Horns spreading wide above each gentle face;
Cows with no thoughts at all but that their road
Leads to the easing of too rich a load.

B. R. GIBBS.

THE WELLINGTON GIFT

IN the course of its curious attack on the late and present Governments, the Duke of Wellington, and everybody concerned with the establishment of the Wellington Museum, the Evening Standard purports to show that the value of the whole gift, which we recently estimated at more than £1,000,000, should be written down to £50,000. This arithmetical feat is performed by valuing at nil all the items affected by restrictions on their sale. The freehold of Apsley House was indeed purchased by the trustees of Parliament's grant to the first Duke, and a statutory settlement enacted that the house was to remain the property of the Duke and his successors. He had, however, bought the house itself and paid for its rebuilding. The majority of the contents were entailed as heirlooms by the first Duke on his successors. But an entail can be broken. The arrears of death duties payable are then very heavy, and an owner stands to get some fraction of the value, although an historic collection has thereby been dispersed. This course was open to the present Duke; or he could have dismantled most of the house and let it off, as the Evening Standard has deemed preferable, in flats and offices (though they would not have been very satisfactory ones); or simply kept it shut up. But, having an enlightened view (which a large public appears to share) of the artistic and historical importance of the house and collection as a whole, he preferred to give them to the country on the condition that they should be kept together and suitably displayed, and himself be enabled to keep to the letter of the statutory settlement by living in part of the house. The newspaper admits that Apsley House and its contents might have fetched even more than a million if sold in the open market. That, then, is their value; not to the Duke, but to the country. He has ensured that this magnificent and historic unity is preserved intact, at a cost to the public off-set, incidentally, by the value of the free components of his gift. He has never claimed to be a public benefactor, but it is both churlish and untrue to deny the fact.

CHURCH REVENUES

THE Church Commissioners' fourth annual report is on the whole encouraging. Their income, apart from some £1.4 million from Trust funds, amounted to £6.5 million, a real increase of £296,000. This has made it possible to increase allocations for augmenting clergy stipends from the £350,000 per annum contemplated last year to £500,000 per annum, thus bringing the day appreciably nearer when every incumbent will be assured of an income of £500 per annum. More than half the diocesan boards have already agreed to this, and the remainder will do so, it is hoped, before the end of the year. There are 13,132 benefices and "conventional districts" in the country which, including Bishops and Chapters, account for £4.3 million (as against £3.7 million last year) of the outgoings from the Commissioners' general fund. Private contributions and bequests for endowment have totalled £76,197, to which the Commissioners have added £26,136, under the scheme to encourage such gifts. It has been possible to increase the provision for building new parsonages to £486,314. In the capital account some 20,000 acres of agricultural land have been sold and general income thereby benefited, while that from rentals also increased by some £237,000. The problem of the Commissioners' urban properties, many of which are liabilities, is gradually being reduced; in the case of one, comprising over a thousand houses, by sale to the London County Council.

WASTED CALVES

IN the note last week on beef calves it was mentioned that the number of small calves going for immediate slaughter to the Ministry of Food is over 12,000 a year. This is, in fact, an average weekly figure, and points to the urgent need for a policy that will ensure that more of these so-called "bobby" calves from dairy herds are retained at least for a few months to make veal. There is no need for another Government subsidy here. All that is wanted is a proper price for fat calves marketed up to 200 lb. carcass weight, comparable to the price which the Ministry of Food pays for lamb and mutton. This would happen on a free market, and it really is not wise of the Ministry of Food to require dairy farmers to throw away their male calves which will not make good beef animals. Many farmers could manage to fatten a few calves, so adding usefully to the country's meat supplies.

AFTER HELSINKI

IN the flood of criticism which has followed our performance in the Olympic Games it is not easy to retain a sense of proportion, but it is essential to try. We must not fall into one of two extremes, utter humiliation or unjustified complacency. Those who incline towards too comfortable a mood point out that our team was stronger than ever before, and that some of the achievements of our "also rans" surpassed those of previous winners. This is true, but it leaves out the fact that other nations also are far from having stood still; they, too, have improved, and some of them seem to have improved more than we have. If we want to win, that is a phenomenon for which we must be prepared; even the heroic Lovelock cannot for ever set the standard for one-milers. In special cases there may be special reasons for our comparative failure, such as that with us hockey is a winter game played on heavy turf, whereas the Indians, our conquerors, play on hard ground, making a different game of it. Generally speaking, however, excuses are a mistake; there is nothing for it but to aim higher and be readier to learn from other people, as, by way of example, in rowing. We were pretty good, but not quite good enough, and, really, one silver medal, for second place in the Women's High Jump, is not quite good enough either.

WHEN THE DAY'S WORK IS DONE

A COUNTRYMAN'S NOTES

By

Major C. S. JARVIS

DURING my long career as a small and not always successful poultry-keeper, I have suffered casualties among the birds of my flock which were caused by a whole variety of both wild and domestic animals, and some of the tragic incidents were most unusual. The fox, of course, figures at the top of the list of murderers, with one or two cases of almost complete extermination of all the hens in a house; a stray dog carried out the same work nearly as thoroughly; and there was one regrettable occasion when a badger strayed from the paths of virtue. Then the stoat has taken its toll from time to time, buzzards, sparrow-hawks and also a merlin have picked up young birds in the spring, and there was one particularly large and evil rat which had killed half-a-dozen laying hens on their nests before the Scottie caught him napping one morning.

ALL these incidents are of a quite ordinary nature, and most poultry-keepers have experienced them. Among the unusual cases was a hen that died of asphyxiation through trying to swallow a small frog, and several turkeys, together with a few chickens, that were stung to death by bees from my own hives; for although an apiarist reader pointed out recently that I was completely ignorant of bees, a ruling with which I agree, I was, in fact, a bee-keeper, and the owner of four hives, when I lived in Egypt. I think that the bees on this occasion had a certain amount of justification for their behaviour, because a young Egyptian official, who had just passed his written examination as an expert apiarist, came up from Cairo to demonstrate his recently acquired knowledge on my hives. After he had been interfering with the intimate life in the combs for about half an hour, the infuriated population of the four hives sallied forth intent on reprisals, and, since they knew that someone wearing a scarlet tarbush was responsible for the outrage, they attacked the red-wattled turkey cocks in a near-by pen when they failed to overtake the official, who had beaten a hurried retreat to the railway station to escape from my bees and me.

IT occurred to me after I had killed a 20-inch adder while it was indulging in a sun-bath at the entrance to the trap-door of the hen-house in the poultry-run that, so far as I know, I have never lost a hen through the bite of an adder. This seems to be more or less a matter of luck, since the average hen is always greatly interested in worms of large size, and an adder in the poultry-run is a comparatively common occurrence in this reptilian locality, where I see some variety of snake once a week, if not more frequently. It is just possible that the hen has sufficient common sense to realise instinctively that the adder is a dangerous creature to be avoided at all costs.

It seems that adders do not appreciate the full blaze of the sun during a real heat wave. Though one can count on seeing them indulging in a bask on the moorland footpaths on most warm and sunny days in spring, they are not nearly so evident when the sun has reached its zenith on a really hot day in summer. All the books that I have read dealing with the adder state that it is to be found on heather-grown moorlands. Though this is true to a certain extent, I think that the close proximity of water is essential to adders. Most of the spots in the New Forest where I can usually count on seeing one of these reptiles on a suitable day are near permanent springs that flow to the surface among the heather and gorse, or to a boggy patch with small stagnant pools in the peaty soil. Occasionally also I notice an adder swimming in a small pool in the garden, but it is probably there in search of a small frog or fish, and is not taking a bath to cool off.

I WAS told a story recently about a dog's remarkable behaviour and was warned beforehand that in all probability I should not believe it, but that if I had any doubts about the veracity of my informant the vicar of the parish would vouch for the truth of the episode. The story concerned a cocker spaniel bitch, who took a special interest in some domestic rabbits which her mistress kept in a wire run in the garden, and who always attended the ceremonies when the rabbits were fed during the day and shut up at night in their hutch. As is usual with most dogs, the spaniel was most anxious to help her human being in most of the daily tasks, and also had a very strong sense of the discipline to be observed by all domestic animals, dogs alone excluded. She was, therefore, most distressed when on many evenings it was found that one of the rabbits had forced its way under the wire and was sampling the vegetables in the garden. The rounding up of the trespasser was, of course, a task that the spaniel could carry out far more efficiently than any human being, and after a week or so the bitch took over the job completely. Whenever a straying rabbit was found loose in the garden, she played the part of a retriever and, picking it up in her mouth, carried it to the wire run, the door of which she pushed open with her nose and closed after the operation had been successfully performed. The amusing part about this enforcement of discipline was that the rabbit showed not the slightest fear of the spaniel, and seemed almost to enjoy being retrieved and carried across the garden.

I am not going to ask the vicar of the parish to confirm this story, because I find no difficulty in believing it. The Scottie, who helps me shut up the hens at night, has the same strong views about the discipline to be observed by other domestic creatures, and is only too willing to retrieve the bird that has flown over the wire-netting. Since he is not a soft-mouthed spaniel bitch, however, but a very hard-mouthed Scotch terrier, I do not enlist his help on these occasions.

It need hardly be said that no decent person would ever refer to a woman as a bitch. As a confirmed dog-lover and a great admirer of the animal's character, I have always doubly resented that use of the word; for a woman who is deceitful, bad-tempered and lacking in all the feminine good qualities is the direct opposite of the real bitch in every respect. One of the results of this use of the word was that in Victorian and Edwardian days one was barred from using the word "bitch" in any connection in polite society, and when it was necessary to speak or write of the females of the canine species they were always alluded to as "lady dogs," or something equally idiotic. Seeing that one was permitted to talk about tigresses, mares, ewes and other feminine creatures, it was both ridiculous and hypocritical to ban the word "bitch" absolutely because it had been improperly used by our forbears to describe conceited and cantankerous women.

THE MOST REMOTE SPOT IN U.S.A.

Written and Illustrated by W. A. POUCHER

WAS a visit to Monument Valley within the range of possibility? That was the question I discussed one evening with my friend, David Britten, as we pored over the maps of Utah and Arizona in my hotel in Salt Lake City.

I had flown the 2,200 miles from New York on the previous day, and when I left at 8 a.m. the weather looked promising. But after we touched down at Chicago heavy cloud obscured the landscape, save in one place where a gap revealed the city of Des Moines 17,000 feet below. The great plane stopped for half an hour in Denver to refuel, and on taking off to cross the Rocky Mountains of Colorado we flew at 20,000 feet in a dense white blanket which completely hid the peaks below. After an eight-hour flight I landed in Salt Lake City to find the adjacent plain and its surrounding mountains covered in deep snow, with an evening temperature twenty degrees below zero. My friend came out on the tarmac to greet me and we shivered in the bitter wind while waiting for my luggage to be unloaded. Then we drove to our hotel and there discussed our plans.

During my previous visits to this part of the United States I had been fortunate enough to explore the Grand Canyon, Bryce and Zion Canyons, of which I have given accounts in COUNTRY LIFE, together with such less famous places as the Painted Desert, Petrified Forest and Blue Forest. To complete my survey of this colourful part of America there remained only Monument Valley, which is perhaps the most inaccessible spot in the whole of this vast continent. It spans the State Line between Utah and Arizona, and is situated in the centre of the great desert of the Navajo Indian Reservation; about half way between Monticello on the road into Colorado, and the highway between Flagstaff and Salt Lake. According to the maps a track in the desert connected these two main roads, with trading posts here and there as the only links with civilization.

Several questions claimed our attention. As many of the roads were snowed up, could we get to Monticello? Was the 215-mile track across the desert passable in a motor-car, and especially after rain? Could petrol be obtained anywhere between the main roads? How were we to get back to civilization if the car broke down? Must we take food and water, as according to the maps no water was available anywhere en route? Could we find a bed at the trading posts, or must we sleep out of doors? The information counter in the hotel could not answer one of these questions and in desperation we phoned the travel office in the city, but they could offer no advice and only knew that in the summer a few adventurous travellers went that way. In the end we retired to bed without making up our minds as to whether the journey was worth the risks entailed.

We had arranged to have breakfast together at 8 a.m. the next morning, but my friend had already been busy making enquiries before we met, and he had found that the road to Monticello was passable. There was, however, an alternative but more circuitous way to Monument Valley, through Mt. Carmel, Jacob Lake and Navajo Bridge, which involved a drive of some 650 miles compared with 500 by the direct route. We chose the latter because it passed near the Arches National Monument where we would see something spectacular. We therefore loaded the car and were on our way by 9 a.m.

We left by the four-line highway running due south from Salt Lake and the leaden sky turned to snow before we entered Provo. It cleared just before we bore to the left at Springvale to begin the long ascent and crossing of the Uinta chain of mountains. These are dominated by Provo Peak at 11,054 feet, and the highest point on the road is 7,454 feet at Soldier Summit. The snow ploughs had been working earlier that morning and we attained the crest of the pass without incident. The scenery on this route must be magnificent in clear weather, but all we saw was the snow slopes, dotted with trees, sweeping up into the curtain of cloud at about 8,000 feet.

So far we had driven along a broad, twisting valley, but beyond the pass the road dropped suddenly into a wild and narrow canyon, where hair-pin bends followed one another in quick succession, to straighten out on entering Price. Since this would be the last town on our route we made several enquiries about our proposed journey, but gleaned no encouraging information anywhere.

On leaving the town we encountered the first section of desert, backed by the long, broken line of Book Cliffs on the eastern horizon. They assumed a dull russet hue beneath the sunless sky and we followed them for some seventy miles over a fast highway, flanked on the west by a vast stretch of red sand, studded with scrub and bounded by Red Plateau, the occasional sandstone towers of which made a jagged distant skyline. The map showed a few places on our route, which turned east at Greenriver and went on to Grand Junction in Colorado, but we discovered that most of them were mere names and on arriving at Crescent Junction were delighted to find a few dwellings, a petrol station, a place where we could eat and two small planes that used the road as a runway. We, therefore, stopped for lunch and duly enquired as to the prospects of reaching Monument Valley. It transpired that someone knew someone else who had been there and back in a day, found the journey very risky and knew of no accommodation in the desert.

Despite this information we turned off to the south after eating and in fifteen miles came to the sandy track leading to the Arches National Monument. As it was only 2.30 p.m.

we decided to drive the eight miles and investigate, but we eventually covered nearly forty miles on the several side tracks leading to special points of interest. We also walked considerable distances to get near views of some of the formations, which included huge monoliths and great arches, all remarkable examples of nature's bizarre architecture. The lack of sunlight, however, robbed them of their wonderful colouring, as they all consisted of red sandstone and, being amazing specimens of erosion on the grand scale, they must be of great geological interest.

At 5 p.m. we entered the village of Moab, where all enquiries proved fruitless, and agreed that we might as well cover the further 63 miles to Monticello, since its relative proximity to Monument Valley would, we hoped, yield some definite information. For the last hundred miles the road had averaged a height of 4,000 feet, and as Monticello stood on the 7,050 feet contour we had a considerable ascent ahead. Darkness came suddenly when we were half-way there, and, since the last ten miles of the road was under repair and the surface very icy, driving became difficult.

We pulled up at 7 p.m. in the snowbound village to find it consisted of a few dwellings, a sheriff's residence, a petrol station, a café and an obviously new hotel. We entered the office to ask for rooms and were greeted by a nine-year-old girl, with beautifully waved hair and painted nails, which made us glance at one another in wonder. However, this young lady knew her business and said that her father and mother were out but would be back by 9 p.m.; in the meantime she could provide two rooms on payment of four dollars each. While we signed the usual forms her young brother ran into the office and to our amazement also displayed painted nails. The rooms were comfortable and well heated, which made us glad to escape from the bitter north wind outside. We unloaded our baggage and then made for the café, which provided us with a splendid meal. We enquired about our objective from sundry customers, such as truck drivers and Indians, but, surprising as it may seem, none of them had been there and none could give information.

We were now desperate and our only hope lay in the proprietor of the hotel. On returning at 9 p.m. we found him there and he greeted me with: "You are British, I believe. What would I give to be in England again in the spring!" He had been stationed in Norfolk during the second World War and spoke highly of the kindness with which he had been received everywhere. He strongly advised us to risk the journey to Monument Valley as he had been there on one occasion and found it one of the wonders of the west. He also recommended us to take the side track to the Goosenecks of the San Juan River, as this was another marvel of the district. Finally, he gave us two cards of introduction to the owners of trading posts and felt sure that we should find food and beds at one of them. Here, at long last, was the news we had hoped for and we retired to bed early with great anticipations of the morrow.

We were on our way early next morning and carried ample reserves of food and drink in case of need. Twenty-two miles of icy track brought us to a trading post at Blanding, whence our route descended sharply to leave both snow and ice behind and to place us on a winding track through the red desert. Some twenty-seven miles of flat country ended with a sudden descent through a twisting canyon and revealed the few Indian dwellings of Bluff, at the foot of some spectacular vertical columns of sandstone at an elevation of 4,500 feet. For the next few miles the track wound through abundant juniper and yucca and then began to ascend in the direction of a long ridge on the horizon. Rough rock replaced soft sand and we eventually crossed innumerable beds of tilted sandstone to reach the crest of the ridge, where a narrow opening disclosed the landscape ahead. Here the sand changed to a multitude of colours, in which bright greens intermingled with every shade of red, and then a precipitous descent on the edge of a chasm led us across dry but very soft sand in the bed of Comb Wash. A mile beyond it our way forked at a spot enclosed by cliffs: there was no finger-post to guide us, nor could we see for more than a hundred yards. We took the left branch, which happily proved to be the correct one. Half an hour later we emerged on the lofty desert plateau to spy the peculiar hump of Mexican Hat standing up against the sky, some fifteen miles to the south.

In due course we encountered the sign-posted fork to the Goosenecks, and as we were only six miles away we drove along to see them. The track ended on a flat sheet of rock and 1,000 feet below lay the twisting canyon carved in the desert plateau by the meandering San Juan River on its way to join the Colorado. This was indeed another remarkable example of nature's handiwork, which unfortunately did not look its best in the poor light.

On our way again, we soon passed the lonely trading post of Mexican Hat, situated on the banks of the San Juan where a rickety bridge carried us over the river. On attaining the plateau we could pick out the obelisks of Monument Valley on the distant skyline: they stood up like grim sentinels in this vast desolation and for centuries had brooded over the land occupied by the roving tribes of Navajo Indians. Here then was the first view of the amazing scene I had come so far to explore and photograph, but in sunless conditions the results would be disappointing, so we halted awhile and there ate our first meal since breakfast. The air was motionless when we got out of the car, but half an hour later a breeze sprang up from the south and gaps began to appear in the leaden clouds. The advent of the blue was just what I wanted and we moved off in the direction of Monument Pass, hoping that the sky would have cleared by the time we reached it.

As we climbed so the valley sank away to the east where we could see numerous pinnacles and towers approximating in shape to those ahead of us, which evidently stood on the rim. The track wound in and out of tumbled boulders as large as small cottages and through debris from the fallen monuments of past ages, and eventually reached the crest of the pass immediately to the west of Brigham's Tomb, one of the largest sandstone masses on the rim. Looking up into the clearing sky, we estimated its height at about 1,000 feet; it was narrower than we had expected, but its north and south fronts must have been nearly a quarter of a mile long.

Conditions were now favourable for both monochrome and colour photography and we spent the remainder of the afternoon taking shots of the rim monuments as we proceeded south down the long twisting track of golden sand.

One of the hotel cards introduced us to Harry Goulding and his wife, who twenty-seven years previously had come to Monument Valley to establish its first trading post. Some five miles to the south of the pass we found a sign directing us to it, one and a half miles from the main track across the desert. Leaving the car we entered the store to find to our regret that its proprietors had just left for Flagstaff on a week's holiday. However, we spoke to the man who was temporarily in charge and in reply to our enquiries he said that not only could he give us two beds in a small lodge outside and arrange for us to eat with the family, but he could also provide a jeep next day for the exploration of the valley and act as our guide.

It seemed that this kindly gentleman spent much of his time in summer this way and had also assisted Hollywood producers when they flew in to photograph these spectacular monuments as backgrounds for western films.

We deposited our baggage in the small lodge and then drove back to the rim at a point about five miles east of the pass. Ahead of us rose two of the most conspicuous monuments, known as the Mittens, because their rock formations simulated the fingers and thumb of giant hands. Here we left the car and wandered along the rim while the sun sank lower and lower towards the western horizon. The waning light produced some marvellous effects and before we returned to the post the monuments stood up from the burning sands of the desert like immense golden cathedrals, aloof, forlorn and magnificent, and yet so unreal that they might have been a gigantic backdrop to a Wagnerian opera.

Our fifty-mile journey next day proved to be one of the most memorable highlights of my experience, as dawn broke with a clear atmosphere and a few clouds scattered over a lovely blue sky. Since these conditions prevailed throughout the day my friend and I saw Monument Valley at its best. For, not only were its spectacular colours revealed to perfection, but our friendly guide knew just where to take us at the right time of day for the lighting and thus enabled us to photograph every scene from monument and arch to pre-historic writings on the valley walls under perfect conditions.

Moreover, we encountered a family of Navajo Indians on the move, with their sheep and goats, which brought life and reality to the utter desolation of this marvellous pageant.

Next morning the jeep was loaded with food, water and presents for any Indians we might meet and we were on our way by 9 a.m. Following the approach of our previous evening trip, we dropped over the rim and bore to the west along the valley floor to get a different view of the monuments on the rim. We returned behind the more distant Mitten and there encountered a Navajo family on the move. These people are quite prepared to be photographed if a small gift is forthcoming, and the children like to have peppermints and the women oranges. The two shepherd boys and the girl appearing in these pages are typical of the children, who at the age of nine years seem to be well developed and reasonably intelligent. Each family lives in a hogan, which is constructed of juniper wood, is circular in shape and always has its entrance facing the east. We were invited into one of them and found it surprisingly clean and spacious. On leaving these wanderers behind we made for a grotesque formation known as the Two Sisters and a Novice, and then went to the North Window by a roundabout route. This is a fine subject for both artist and photographer, as immense red buttresses form the sides of the window, through which many of the more isolated monuments are seen in excellent grouping. Thereafter, we found a sheltered corner in one of the larger masses and made a camp fire on which we brewed some coffee to wash down our sandwiches.

An hour later we were on our way to see the pre-historic dwellings in a large cave, near which some hieroglyphics on the wall of rock outside proved interesting. Then came the inspection of several immense arches, extraordinary examples of erosion. Thence we made for the Totem Pole and the Ye-Bi-Chai Dancers, which rise in isolation at the extreme end of the valley and are about twenty-five miles from the trading post. These weird and slender columns are first seen across golden sand dunes, but since even a jeep might sink into them and become immovable we took a long détour to avoid them and to reach the base of the Totem Pole. This obelisk is thought to be the slenderest in the world, rises to a height of 1,006 feet above the floor of the desert and casts a shadow in winter that is estimated to be thirty-five miles long. My friend and I walked round these strange monuments, but had to go a long way back to get them into the viewfinders of our cameras. The changing light made a striking difference in their colour; for when we arrived they were pale pink and an hour later deep red, the variation being doubtless due to the lower angle of the sunlight.

At 5 p.m. we left them behind and returned to the rim by a different route which revealed some of the monuments with a more attractive and delicate colour than that of the morning. On our gaining the rim most of the cloud had dissolved and the empty sky robbed the scene of the previous evening's splendour. We regained the post at 6.30 p.m., just in time for the evening meal. The "family" had changed during our absence, as earlier in the day two helicopters had arrived and their occupants had come to make a survey of Monument Valley.

We departed for the south next morning, well content with our experience, and faced with a drive of nearly 270 miles to Kanab and civilization. But our car behaved splendidly until we reached the first petrol station on the main highway, when one flat tyre, followed by another next day, necessitated the purchase of one new cover. Our luck was in; for what should we have done if this had occurred in the desert?

MONUMENT VALLEY AT SUNDOWN

FLOWER-SHOW IN THE CORN

By GEOFFREY GRIGSON

"THE YEARLY FLOWER-SHOW IN THE CORN IS NOT WHAT IT USED TO BE." Harvesting on the downs near Dover during the war, when a wealth of flowers growing among the corn was still a feature of many fields

THIS is not an article for the good farmer, since in part it is an article of regret (no doubt wrong and anti-social) that the yearly flower-show in the corn is not what it used to be. Weeds are weeds, a very proper term of distinction and opprobrium. A plant that bears a fine flower and grows among the wheat is growing in the wrong place. And it is the farmer's job and the job of those who supply him with seed corn to see that it does not grow there, be the flowers never so dazzling. So the seed is better cleaned, the selective weed-killers kill the charlock, even the ancient poppies of the corn are scarcer, and the immense fields are of a more unrelieved green or unrelieved amber.

Older writers give a different picture of the cornfield through the stages of growth. The Tudor agriculturist Fitzherbert included a section in his Boke of Husbandry on the "dyvers maner of wedes," and how the farmers of his time were troubled with kedloke or charlock, corn cockle, golds or corn marigolds, and hawdods, which are corn bluebottles (though oddly he does not mention poppies). Skip two and a half centuries to John Clare writing about the annual show in the fields of Northamptonshire. He knew weeds to be weeds, but he had an affection for the worst offenders, delighting in "the lighter hues of wheat and barley intermixed with the sunny glare of the yellow charlock and the sunset imitation of the scarlet headaches"—which are poppies—and in "the corn bluebottles crowding their splendid colour in large sheets over the land and troubling the cornfields with destroying beauty."

No difficulty still in finding the charlock, in seeing hillsides yellow with its glare; or finding poppies, for which I recommend a drive across Salisbury Plain, from Devizes to Old Sarum; or corn marigold, though you have to go to the right kind of acid soil, in Devon, Cornwall, Wales or the North, or in Ireland. (I recall an Irish field of oats flaming with patches of corn marigold and purple loosestrife). These are plants still to be abolished. In most parts, though, you will not find it so easy to come by a corn cockle and a corn bluebottle. Instructive to compare two floras, one 50 years old or thereabouts, the other of 1952. Corn cockle the older flora describes as "a common cornfield weed." The new flora says "a common but decreasing cornfield weed," which is certainly saying too much for some parts of the country. In Surrey or in Wiltshire 30 years ago you could have picked a bunch in five minutes. Round my own village in Wiltshire the corn cockle has become so scarce that I have found only one of its bright flat eyes staring out of the wheat through the last 10 years. Bluebottles must have decreased a good deal between the time of John Clare and 1900. "Not uncommon" are the words of the older flora about Centaurea cyanus, while the new one has to say: "Formerly common throughout Great Britain but now rare owing to greater care in cleaning seed-grain." Maybe we should applaud, but I would have given something to see a vast cyanine sheet of its destroying beauty, perhaps bordering an acre or two of poppies.

For the plant hunter this diminution has its good side in the very scarcity of some of the cornfield weeds. It makes every excursion along the edge of the crop into a treasure hunt, which is now and then rewarded. Some of the most flaunting or peculiar corn plants were always uncommon, some rare, extra-exciting plants to find on that account and because they speak in a still finer language of the ancient spread of farming from the Mediterranean or south-western Asia into our colder island. Of the common intruders, some are natives, such as the poppy, some of doubtful standing, for instance the bluebottle, the corn marigold and even charlock. Most of the uncommon or rare ones are invaders from across the Channel, from southern Europe. If they can live in an English wheat-field, the balance has only to be tipped slightly and they are in danger. Everything is against them, from climate to better farming and better cleansing of the grain; that is why corn cockle, which may be a poisonous plant and certainly did not improve the flour with its seeds, is on the way to joining the most select band of all.

Three of this band are among the best-looking plants which make a home in England. These are the wild larkspur, the pheasant's eye and the plant which has no more evocative name than field cow-wheat or Poverty Weed. If you find any one of them this year, or any year, it is worth the finding and worth reporting. I fancy the blue flowers of the larkspur (Delphinium Ajacis) can be seen only against the longest odds. It used to be fairly frequent in the chalky fields of Cambridgeshire, but it has declined to unpredictable, casual and rare appearance. The chances of seeing the pheasant's eye and the cow-wheat are a little better, rare as both of them may be, especially if you are on terms with a local botanist who may know a field where they recur, annuals both of them, like most of the corn plants.

Along with its relative, Adonis aestivalis, this Adonis annua or pheasant's eye, which in Gloucestershire was called Love-lies-bleeding, and in Wiltshire, next door, Jack-in-the-green, is a gardener's annual, but it is one thing to grow it in a border, another thing altogether to discover it among the green blades, where its black-centred scarlet eyes look more brilliant and exotic. They knew it well in the fields during the 16th century, "trailing or leaning to the ground, set on every part with fine jagged leaves very deeply cut like those of Camomil, or rather those of Maiweede." But even then it was not to be found everywhere. Gerarde of the Herbal goes on: "The red flower of Adonis groweth wilde in the west parts of Englande among their corne, even as Maie-weede doth in other parts, and is likewise an enimie to corne as Maie-weed is, from thence I brought the seede, and have sowed it in my garden for the beautie of the flowers sake." Gerarde's "west parts of England" is only half accurate. At least, its range now is southern, Oxfordshire above, Dorset below. It seems to have been common enough in his day to be brought to London and sold by flower-women as Rose-aruby; and either from gardens or the wild, or semi-wild, of the cornfields, flower-women still cried it round the streets two centuries later as Red Morocco.

The cow-wheat (Melampyrum arvense) looks even more fantastic in an English corn crop. The odds are a bit more favourable, between Lincolnshire and Hampshire and Wiltshire, though you will hardly see it by the acre, or by the score of acres, as the irritated farmers of the Isle of Wight knew it 50 or 100 years ago. Picture a plant between 10 and 20 ins. tall, with much the habit of the smaller, more delicate and widely familiar cow-wheat of the woods, the flowers not yellow alone, but with a yellow throat, a pink and yellow tube, and lips of a pink deeper and more intense. Between the flowers the bracts make a turret of pinkish-purple, set off by the green leaves. This was the Poverty Weed of the Isle of Wight, which the farmers used to pull up and burn in the fields between Ventnor and St. Lawrence. John Vaughan wrote well of the cow-wheat in his Wild-flowers of Selborne (1906), which is one of the best books of its kind, worth buying out of a secondhand book-shop. "Seen for the first time, one is amazed at the sight of this strange and showy species growing in such remarkable profusion" (in which it grows no more, confined now in the island to one single bank). "It flourishes not only among the wheat and barley, but also on the dry banks and grassy borders of the fields; it has invaded the bushy slopes above Pelham Woods, and may be seen all along the upper edge of the cliff," with "its long leafy spikes of purple and yellow flowers, and beautifully variegated tracts of a bright rose." To make matters richer, pheasant's eye and the cow-wheat grew together in the same crops in the island. Not far from my own home in Wiltshire there is a downland cornfield where the cow-wheat has shown its improbable self each high summer since 1942; one

THE CORN-COCKLE, A PLANT OF THE CORNFIELDS THAT IN MANY DISTRICTS IS BECOMING INCREASINGLY SCARCE

CORN BLUEBOTTLES. John Clare wrote of their "crowding their splendid colour in large sheets over the land and troubling the cornfields with destroying beauty" plant of it last year even produced flowers of a pure white. Its hold is precarious. This year I have found only two plants.

This odd weed, if it must be called a weed, has not a long history as an English plant. James Sherard, the botanist and apothecary whose name (with his brother's name) lives in the humbler weed of Sherardia arvensis, or field madder, first came on it with surprise in the corn at Litcham, in Norfolk, early in the 18th century.

With blue and letter-box and harlequin flowers, these three are the prize-winners in the show, in the special class, for colour and habit and for not lurking behind every blade of wheat or barley. But when all is said, it is the common poppy that we must hope—pace the farmer—is going to survive longest of all, a companion of the cereals so ancient that the very name we give it may come from the word pa pa, which was used thousands of years ago by the people of Sumer.

Wheat and poppy have been inseparables. Fierce extents of poppy seem to have been looked upon as a kind of life-blood sprouting out of the soil along with the life-food. No accident that the ancient Italian goddess Ceres, the cereal goddess, who taught men to sow, reap, thresh and winnow, had the poppy as one of her plants no less than the cereals themselves; that if she had a crown of ripe wheat on her yellow hair, and a lighted torch in one hand, in the other she held corn and poppies together. Also no accident that in Greece it was a flower of Aphrodite as goddess of vegetation, or that Assyrians spoke of it with respect as "Daughter of the Field." Our own symbol of the Flanders Poppy shows that the link between life and the blood-red weed of the cornfields still exists in feeling or fancy. We are not Assyrian, Greek, or Roman, yet stripping ourselves of every other sentiment, we are still left (if we do not happen to have planted the wheat) with that undeniable delight in the sheer colour.

I suppose that sooner or later the poppy is done for. Larger fields, fewer corners of waste, not an inch left in the margins, and even so able and persistent a native will have no chance. And for what the world will be when all the weeds have gone, I must refer you to the last lines of a poem called Inversnaid by Hopkins and remind you as well of the compact lines in which that master of description combined sky, wheat and poppy. "To-day," he wrote, "the sky is two and two."

*With white strokes and strains of the blue.
The blue wheat-acre is underneath
And the braided ear breaks out of the sheath,
The ear in milk, lush the sash,
And crush-silk poppies aflash,
The blood-gush blade gash
Flame-rash ruddy
Bud shelling or broad-shed
Tatter-tassel-tangled and dingle-a-dangled
Dandy-hung dainty head.*

I shan't try the lines on my next-door neighbour on Manor Farm, who also is not Assyrian, Greek, Roman, or poet; but have a look at a poppy in a wheatfield and see if they are not true.

BLAGDON, NORTHUMBERLAND—III

THE HOME OF VISCOUNT RIDLEY

By CHRISTOPHER HUSSEY

The garden lay-out, completed in 1938, is the last executed from designs by Sir Edwin Lutyens. While restoring a version of the original setting of the house, it is a notably original conception

BLAGDON is shown in a painting of about 1735 to have had formal gardens and enclosures that related the house snugly to its site on the windy plateau that stretches north of Newcastle. They were landscaped away later in the century, possibly as early as 1755, the date of a plan in the style of Capability Brown by one F. Richardson, but were to some extent replaced by a typically Victorian garden scheme. This included a large round pool before the south front, with shrubberies and elaborate flower-beds. That in its turn had been removed when the present Lord and Lady Ridley came to live here in 1924. So, whenever Sir Edwin Lutyens, Lady Ridley's father, visited Blagdon, ideas were inevitably discussed for re-planning the garden on lines more appropriate to the dignified Georgian house and to the spaciousness of the site.

On the east and north sides there is a mature landscape park, sufficiently diversified by woodland and trees, some of which survive from the early Georgian lay-out, and by the original “blakedene” dingle of the place-name. Southwards the ground is plumb level, stretching away to the valley of the Tyne and the distant Durham hills. Westwards, where it begins to fall, the walled kitchen garden lies some 300 yards away. Over all is the usually windy Northumbrian sky. The problem was to bring these elements into architectural relationship to the house, and between 1926 and 1938 a plan was gradually put into execution. All that was necessary on the park side was to tidy up the approach to the house, as illustrated in the first of these articles. The next thing was to do the same for that to the kitchen garden, which, to make it more difficult, is set obliquely to the house.

It was found, however, that if the line of the south front was protracted westwards, it almost exactly impinged on the east corner of the kitchen garden. A straight walk was accordingly formed on this line. In front of the house it serves as a paved terrace with a shallow arrangement of beds, clipped box and herbs between the walk and the house (Fig. 4). At the west end of the house, steps descend through yew walls to the next level, where the texture of the paving is varied with old mill-stones and bricks inlaid (Fig. 5). This section is bordered with sentinel yews intended to be formed into arches when they grow. It leads down more steps with yew walls to a square lawn surrounded by herbaceous borders and yew hedges, where the path is barred by a balustrade, the platform paved with slate-on-edge and flanked by steps (Fig. 7). Funkias are effectively massed below the balustrade (Fig. 8), from which an avenue of flowering trees and shrubs is seen lining the sloping gravel walk beyond. It ends in a circular feature (Fig. 9) the periphery of which is divided into six sections, three of them segmental walls of which that on the opposite arc masks the corner of the garden wall. The three open sections, flanked by six lead urns brought from Italy by the late Lord Ridley, admit walks of which one is parallel to the wall. The imagination and care applied to the design of this walk, which, though straight and continuous, is varied in each section and at once grand and domestic, are characteristic of its designer and make this brief description of it a pleasure now rare.

To the south of the house it was difficult to create anything in the nature of an aligned vista, such as Lutyens considered essential to a garden, because there was nothing to align on. He therefore decided to create a distant point, and to use the sky and the spacious horizon as the dominant elements in the design, leading the eye into the distance and reflecting the sky in water (available from an existing source). His “sky-mirror” takes the form of a canal on the axis of the south front, but separated from it by a shallow lawn. Its length (580 ft.) is exaggerated by the width being contracted from 33 ft. to 29 ft. half way, where a pair of piers are set, diminishing to 20 ft. at the end, where it expands into a circular basin of 50 ft. diameter. A colossal bronze statue of Milo, by Lough, some 12 ft. high in all, has been placed in the middle of the basin. This object alone is sufficiently considerable, with the perspective of the canal, to draw the eye into the distance and give a point to the view. The vista is bounded by yew hedges; that on the west is part of an enclosure planted with trees which in time will close that side as effectively as it is shut in on the east by the old beech tree.

The nearer half of the canal is reinforced by alternating squares of flowers and turf, each of the latter containing an apple tree, and the former duplicated into a chequer pattern at the northern end. The squares (reminiscent of parts of the garden at Viceroy's House, Delhi) appear continuous at ground level (Fig. 3), and that effect should, perhaps, be emphasised by furnishing them with a larger proportion of low-growing evergreen shrubs rather than with herbaceous material. The vista is wide enough for the effect of flatness not to be lost thereby; and the apple trees will themselves soon demand more bulk in the squares. At the same time, it is important not to lose the effect of expansiveness which was the keynote of Sir Edwin's conception. This is grandly exemplified in the diagonal view of the basin and statue at the head of this article, and almost as well in the inward view (Fig. 6).

But the majesty of this design—one of the last works of the greatest modern British architect—and, indeed, the existence of Blagdon as a survival of the liberal tradition of life are in jeopardy from open-cast mining works. In Fig. 2 some dark mounds, visible two fields beyond the end of the canal, are the present workings. Their proposed extension into the intervening fields would not only destroy this landscape's character, but render the house uninhabitable by the continuous din, already distracting enough. This is not the place to argue the technical case against this deplorable proposal, but those responsible should at least weigh the loss involved by the scheme to the future amenities of Newcastle, only 10 miles away, against the short-term gain of combustible material.

For the moment, however, civilisation still flowers with unusual vigour, the fire that might have destroyed Blagdon in 1944 having necessitated overdue alterations and repairs, executed in 1949, which would otherwise not have been possible nowadays.

The library has been reserved for notice in this concluding article as a "Lutyens room," howbeit designed by Mr. Robert Lutyens in 1928 (Fig. 10). Ingeniously arranged to give the maximum shelf space, it is lined with waxed pine; Figs. 11 and 13 illustrate an ingenious book-ladder of Sir Edwin's invention, which folds up into a pole.

Over the mid-Georgian chimney-piece (from a demolished house in Newcastle) hangs Zoffany's conversation portrait of Sir Matthew, second baronet (1745-1819), who, to a large extent, made Blagdon as we see it to-day, painted with a friend, Mr. Pinkney, about 1765 (Fig. 12). And in the library are seen the unique mahogany chairs made traditionally by Chippendale, for his uncle and benefactor Sir Matthew White, the builder of Blagdon, whose initials M.W. compose the pattern of the back (Fig. 15). Though introducing motifs fashionable about 1735, the scrolled feet are characteristic rather of 1755, the probable date of the chairs which are traditionally attributed to Chippendale. The way their design evolves beauty from ingenuity aptly matches these chairs with the illustrations of Sir Edwin Lutyens's work, so much of which is distinguished by the same combination.

The 3rd and 4th Sir Matthew White Ridley both figured prominently in the politics and sport of the county; and the 5th, towards the end of a distinguished Parliamentary career, was in 1900 created Viscount Ridley. His grandson, who succeeded as 3rd

Viscount in 1916, married Miss Ursula Lutyens, so it is not surprising to find the great architect's personality vividly reflected at Blagdon. But it is rather surprising to find evidence of a similar humour in the Georgian Sir Matthew. Yet how else to account for a pair of brilliantly painted but grotesque little pictures that hang in the hall (Figs. 14 and 16)? They are by a little-known Newcastle artist, C. Riley; one depicts Sir Matthew as a legionary with, perhaps, the Roman Wall in the background; the other, a certain John Orrick "aet. 75, 1786." A defective inscription on the back whets but fails to satisfy our curiosity about this character, evidently notorious for his bulbous nose: "He was to undergo an operation and have the swelling cut off his nose, he was bled by the surgeon . . . replied . . . Matthew R."

Besides the modern Ridley-Lutyens portraits by John, Nicholson, and others, which have been previously alluded to, there are two others which carry on the lively sequence originating with Zoffany and Hoppner. William Nicholson's "picnic piece" of Lord and Lady Ridley with their sons (Fig. 17) is one of his most unexpected paintings—derived in equal degrees from a mediæval tapestry and the Déjeuner sur l'herbe, but unmistakably Nicholson in its vivid green framework and reflected lights from the tablecloth. The enchanting little portrait by Rex Whistler (Fig. 18), painted in 1940, is of Laura Ridley depicted as a drummer boy in the Northumberland Hussars, in which regiment Lord Ridley was then serving.

There can be few historic houses where the contemporary arts mingle more spontaneously with those of the past than Blagdon. Yet it is, perhaps, better known in Northumbria for the more serious side of the Whig tradition, which is so well exemplified there, through the active parts played by Lord and Lady Ridley in the administrative, educational, hospital and social work of the region. In the present twilight of country houses that is encouraging, though how long it will be suffered to continue before its foundations are ripped up and stuffed into the furnace seems to depend on the scale of values prevailing at the Ministry of Fuel.

STABLEFORDS AND THINGS

A Golf Commentary by BERNARD DARWIN

WHEN I was away recently on my busman's holiday I received a letter from a friend not unnaturally a little elated with a feat that he and a lady partner had just accomplished. They were playing in a Stableford competition, their handicaps were respectively 6 and 29, and they produced a score under that system of 49 points. He wanted to know if this was a record, and I, having never played in a Stableford competition, and having little learning on the subject, could not tell him; but it certainly sounds an alarmingly large score. Perhaps someone else can tell me and him whether it has ever been equalled. I could at least appreciate the ordinary gross score of the two partners, since it was done on one of my best-loved and most familiar courses, Worlington. It is, as is well known, a nine-hole course—probably the best in the world—and they holed the first nine in 36 and the second in 41. As they had, as he says, "fifteen strokes to play with" this seems to me one of the most remarkable and outrageous scores I ever heard of or anyone else ever heard of. Worlington in 36 by a couple whose united handicaps amounted to 35! It is simply not respectable.

***

It appears that but for some unfortunate hurling away of strokes on the eighth green in the second round their Stableford total would have reached what the cricketing reporter would once have called "the coveted half-century." I don't wonder that they were by that time a little agitated. They must have wondered whether they were on their heads or their heels. For their 49 to be properly understood I ought to be able to tell those statistically and Stablefordly minded what Bogey takes to go round Worlington. Unfortunately I cannot provide that information, though I remember that the Standard Scratch Score is greater by one stroke for the first round of nine holes than the second or vice versa; that is one of the—to me—insoluble mysteries of that great and mysterious subject.

Having asked me whether his total was a record my friend proceeds to a much more embarrassing question. "Is the L.G.U. system of handicapping," he asks, "open to much criticism?" Thinking that I may not be equal to answering, he advises me to consult Miss W. (an eminent golfer whom he knew I should see) as to her opinion. Miss W., however, knew a trick worth two of that. She wholly declined to answer so bold-faced and, indeed, almost impious a question. I, in my humbler sphere, am equally resolute not to be drawn into any such controversy. But this I will say: I do think there must be something a little wrong about his partner's handicap of 29. I venture to commend it to the notice of some such ruthless and august official as the local handicap manager. I never knew that anybody was allowed to have so vast and generous a handicap as 29. Perhaps, nobody is. Since writing that last sentence I have again conferred with Miss W., and she says 36 is the limit. At any rate I ask for information: has anyone ever had a Stableford score of 49 or over? If so, I will back my hero and heroine (so long as her handicap is not cut down) against him. Man and money are—metaphorically—ready at the Dog and Gun.

I did not see any such stupendous golf as that on my holiday, though I watched a very pleasant week-end match between the Seniors and Aldeburgh. It was played as all such friendly matches ought to be played, eight a side, entirely by foursomes, with every couple meeting every other. That is to say it was theoretically conducted on that principle, but so many people wanted to play on the Aldeburgh side that it had constantly to be changed. The result was that the chief Aldeburgh hero, who had won all his three matches, was forced gracefully to retire before the last round. This was disastrous, and the Seniors, who had been down all the way, came with a rush and won the match at last. The course was in the best of order, the greens verdant paradises, and one or two of the Seniors who had never seen it before fell in love with it, as well they might. When I read of the astonishing scores being done here, there and everywhere, I sometimes wonder if these great men would do them at Aldeburgh in a wind. I suppose I should be wrong, but still I don't think they would.

And now to end with a purely egotistical story. I said a fortnight ago something to the effect that Aldeburgh was to-day the one place where I sometimes played a shot (not counting chips in the back garden), and I duly took with me my No. 4 iron for that sacred and solemn purpose. In course of time I went out to play that one iron shot. I chose a spot on the fairway to the ninth hole, perhaps a little over 100 yards from the green, down hill and down wind. It was the kind of shot which any able-bodied child could play with a niblick, but I had the gravest doubts of getting up with my No. 4. The first shot for a whole year! It was a tremendous moment, and I could hardly make up my mind to stop waggling. At last I struck. "Where is it?" I cried in unbearable agitation. "It's on the green," replied a kind friend who accompanied me, and, with rising excitement, "It's making straight for the hole—it's going in!" And then, "No, it's hit the flag." And so it had. The ball was not more than three or four inches from the hole. If the flag had been out—Well, well, it could not be helped, but how wonderful if only it had gone in! What a lovely headline it would have made (I should certainly have sent the news to all the papers): "Rip Van Winkle holes first shot after years," and so on.

There is such a difference between holing and lying dead; "the little less, and what worlds away!" At any rate, I knew when to stop; I did not try to improve on that shot, but put away my No. 4 iron for another year. Next time—in a good hour be it spoken, and touching wood—I shall presumably have grown a little shorter still and must bring my No. 3 to get up, but I shall never be so near again.

VANISHING RIGHTS By W. J. WESTON, Barrister-at-Law

IT is unwise to sleep long upon one's legal rights. For, when waking comes, it may be that the rights have vanished. Money is owed to you; you can enforce your claim to it by the aid of the Court. Delay for six years, though, and your claim is statute-barred; the Court is unable to help you. Reluctance to enforce a right is common. The reluctance is culpable when it results in an undeserved benefit to a wrongdoer or to one careless of his obligations.

To deny a right once valid may seem unjust to the claimant. To grant it may well be more unjust to such as have ordered their affairs unwitting of the right. At any rate, it concerns the commonwealth, says the adage, that litigation shall not continue; for internecine strife cannot but be something of a calamity. Therefore it is that fetters are placed upon the power to assert latent rights. The estate of dead Lazarus has been distributed by due process of law; "his heir might lawfully detain the inheritance bequeathed unto him, and Lazarus, though restored to life, has no Plea or Title unto his former possessions."

Of this extinction of rights by the passage of time you could hardly find a more striking instance than this case, Moses v. Lovegrove, decided in the Court of Appeal last April. Let another have your house or land, openly or implicitly denying your right to it; let this go on for over 12 years, and your right has gone. Trespasser the occupier has been, and during the whole period you could have taken legal action against him. Now, "too late" is the cry.

The defendant had been tenant of the plaintiff's house; but, since 1938, when a dispute arose regarding the amount of rent that should be paid, he had paid no rent. Nor had he made any acknowledgment of the plaintiff's title as his landlord. During the whole period the plaintiff could have sued for her rent; but she refrained until 1952, suing then for rents payable during the six years just elapsed (the earlier rents now no longer being enforceable). During the whole period, too, when rents were being withheld, the plaintiff could have applied for an Order for possession of the house. But there is the Limitation Act of 1939, and Section 4 (3) of that Act says, "No action shall be brought by any other person [any other, that is, than the Crown or a charity] to recover any land after the expiration of twelve years from the date on which the rights of action arose." The plaintiff was told, therefore, that no rents were due to her because the house now belonged to the defendant.

The possession that may, by process of time, develop into property must be what is called an "adverse possession," one that, openly or by implication, denies the title of the owner. The possession must be, says the lawyer airing his Latin, nec vi, nec clam, nec precario; it is not an ousting of the owner by force, it is no surreptitious intrusion, but an open assertion of right, and it does not result from a permission given by the owner.

Thus, by a family arrangement or by an act of generosity a person is permitted to occupy a house without paying rent. However long the possession lasts, it does not become property; for the occupier holds on a licence that may be revoked at any time. Possession is never adverse when it can be referred to a lawful title.

In one case the position was put thus: "At the end of the twelve years the possession of a tenant who has paid no rent becomes adverse during the whole time the adverse possession is validated by the statute; and it is not competent for the landlord to say that he still retains the right to recover rent. . . . The Legislature has treated the mere non-payment of rent as a payment to some person other than the landlord." Denial of rent when rent is due is accounted a denial of the landlord's title; it is adverse possession.

CORRESPONDENCE

INTELLIGENCE IN DOGS

SIR.—As a correspondent to COUNTRY LIFE recently maintained that dogs are not intelligent I thought that the following incident might interest your readers.

When I was a small boy in the middle '80s our family used to leave Nottingham for the summer months to go and stay at Ingoldmells, in Lincolnshire, three miles along the road to Chapel St. Leonards from Skegness. For perhaps three years we had always taken our Irish terrier, Stella, with us, but in the year in question our father decided to leave her behind with the groom. Stella must have been miserable without us children to play with and decided to join us, for three days after we had arrived at Ingoldmells a telegram arrived to say that Stella was missing.

The next day when we children were returning to the house from the beach for lunch, what should we see Foxhounds, which said "Hounds Gentlemen, Please" and "Thank You"—signs which always made me feel rather a bounder—I note that the former sign has now been replaced by one which proclaims "Warning: Horses, Hounds and Men." During the seven years that I have passed along this stretch of road, only once have I seen either a horse, a hound or a man; and the friendly groom to whom I gave a lift to Exeter in no way justified this warning against his present-day fellows!—LUDOVIC GRANT, Axmouth, Seaton, Devon.

EARLY RHINOCEROS IN EUROPE

SIR.—I was much interested in the article on rhinoceros by Sir William Gowers which appeared in your issue of February 1. I enclose a photograph of a coin or medal recently found in Germany by the brother of Mr. Peter Ryhiner, the Swiss collector-naturalist, who sent it to Mr. P. D. Stracey in Assam, who in turn lent it to me to photograph.

Apparently several of these medals were found and they seem to have been struck at Nuremberg. The date on the obverse side is 1748. On the reverse side is the following, translated from the German: "This Rhinoceros has been brought to Europe in the year 1741 by Captain David Moyt from the Sea of Bengal, and in the year 1747 when it was eight and a half years old it was 12 shoes long, 12 shoes girt, and 5.7 shoes high. It feeds daily on 60 pounds of hay, 20 pounds of bread and drinks 14 buckets of water."

There can be little doubt that this rhinoceros is the fourth one mentioned by Sir William Gowers, the one which was painted by J. D.

Meyer and later provided the illustration in Buffon's Natural History.—E. P. GEE, Doyang T. E., Oating P. O., Assam, India.

JAMES WYATT AT BLAGDON

SIR.—In the first of his articles on Blagdon, Northumberland (July 18), Mr. Christopher Hussey suggests that the Rococo plasterwork on the staircase wall may have been executed by the Italian stuccoists imported by Sir Walter Blackett to decorate Wallington. If this be so, it may be more than a coincidence that Wyatt's beautiful stables at Blagdon seem to echo the earlier coach-house at Wallington, which there forms the central block of, and entrance to, the stables.

In his articles on Wallington in COUNTRY LIFE in June, 1918, the late Sir George Otto Trevelyan wrote that the cupola surmounting the coach-house was designed by the first Duke of Northumberland.—R. O. HANCOCK, 73, Egerton Gardens, S.W.3. [We reproduce a photograph of the stables at Wallington.—Ed.]

PREHISTORIC REMAINS IN DERBYSHIRE

SIR.—Your interesting correspondence on prehistoric stone circles and barrows prompts me to send you this picture of Arbor Low, Derbyshire, known as the Stonehenge of the Midlands and considered one of the finest stone circles in England. The purpose of the circle is obscure and opinions are divided as to whether the stones were ever upright. There are 54 stones forming a circle 250 ft. in diameter, and each stone points towards the middle where there are three more stones. The whole stands on a tableland formed by the ditch, which has two entrances.

Incidentally, I believe this to be the only photograph showing the complete circle, for I found it impossible to include it all on one negative. This print is a combination of three negatives, two showing half the circle and the third the sky. Although this may not satisfy the purists, it certainly shows the subject as it really is.—FRANK RODGERS, Derby.

LOCAL NAMES FOR NEWTS

SIR.—The recent correspondence on the names for newts reminds me that a year or two ago I was asked to remove what sounded like "an asgil" from the stone kitchen floor of a Herefordshire house. This strange monster, then unknown to me, turned out to be a newt. When I referred to it by that name the people of the house were quite surprised to learn that newts and asgils were one and the same.

I subsequently learned that at least one authority on Herefordshire dialect spells the word askil, which is closer to another name still generally used—I believe for newts and lizards—which is asker.

To my own knowledge, nisgal is still current in the Black Country—a stronghold of dialect—as the name for but Stella coming bounding along the road with such joy that she jumped up at me and knocked me flat in the middle of the road. But who had brought her and how had she come?

In those days the Great Northern station at Nottingham, subsequently known as the Low Level and now a goods station, was down a side street. My father later made careful enquiries, but Stella had been seen by nobody at the station; she obviously just jumped in and got under a seat. The train then went to Grantham, where it stopped and everybody had to get out. To go to Skegness it was necessary to cross the main line by a bridge, then walk all the way up a long platform and get into a train standing in a siding. Here many mistakes could have been made, but Stella evidently got into the correct train without anybody noticing her.

In due course the train arrived at Skegness, where everybody had to get out and present their tickets at the barrier at the end of the platform. My father learned that the ticket collector held up the last half dozen passengers for somebody to produce a dog ticket, but as everybody declared that they had never seen the dog before he had to let them all pass.

I relate this story to show that Stella, at any rate, possessed intelligence, for she could not have made that complicated trip more than, perhaps, three times before, and there was a whole year between each trip.—D. N. STAFFORD, Kampala, Uganda, East Africa.

CAT FOSTERING RABBIT

SIR,—One often hears of young animals being successfully reared by a foster-mother of an entirely different species, but I should be interested to know whether you or any of your readers have ever heard of a similar combination to that shown in the accompanying photograph, a cat mothering a small wild rabbit.

The rabbit was scarcely three weeks old when it was found in a nest that had been destroyed by a dog. Although there seemed to be little hope of its survival, the rabbit was carried home and presented to the cat, which had had kittens only two days before. The cat accepted it without question. The rabbit also seemed quite happy and immediately settled down with its new mother.

The photograph was taken about a week later, and the rabbit was thriving. The mother washes it and fusses over it exactly as if it were a Family portraits often show women wearing their wedding-rings on their thumbs: this was a fashion in early Georgian days. The Puritans are known to have tried to stop the wearing of wedding-rings: "As wise as ringing a pig."

The custom of English women wearing their rings on their left hands seems perhaps to be of Anglo-Saxon origin. The word "wed" means "pledge," and at her betrothal a girl received a ring to wear upon her right hand; with the fulfilling of the "pledge," the "wedding," it was removed to her left hand.

There seems no real reason why the ring should be of any style or metal in particular. At the end of the 16th century Donne wrote: "Marriage rings are not of this stuff," referring to jet. James II's Queen wore a plain gold ring set with a ruby; Mary Queen of Scots was married to Darnley with a diamond ring enamelled in red; Queen Mary to Philip of Spain with "a plain hoop of gold like other maidens"—suggesting that by Tudor times that had come to be the most usual wedding-ring.

I have heard the old people say that the men usually wore them on their thumbs and that women's rings descended from mother to daughter.

In Ireland no girl would consider herself married without a golden wedding-ring, so it was customary, in poor districts, for the church to own a communal gold ring for the use of anyone too poor to buy one of her own.—M. LITLEDALE, 1, The Cross Roads, Southbourne, Bournemouth, Hampshire.

EXAMPLE ON A TOMB

SIR,—In Cobham Church, Kent, there is a Renaissance tomb erected in 1561, and on its black marble top rest the effigies in alabaster of George Brooke, Lord Cobham, and of Anne, his wife. Lady Cobham is wearing a wedding-ring on the third finger of her left hand. At first sight this seems to disprove Lord Stanhope's suggestion that before the middle of last century it was not customary for ladies to wear their wedding-rings.

In fact, however, we know from Thorpe that the Brooke tomb was "miserably defaced" by the fall of a roof timber during the 18th century; and in 1866 Charles Roach Smith, the Kentish antiquary, wrote to the Gentleman's Magazine to report two considerable restorations. In 1840 the two effigies had been considerably repaired, all the fragments of the tomb being "carefully put together and the general architectural features . . . restored in plaster of Paris." In 1866 a further restoration had been effected by a Mr. Richardson and by Mr. J. G. Waller, of which Roach Smith writes: "No part of the old work has been tampered with . . . and every part of new work added is given from fragments carefully preserved in the repairs of 1840."

It is immediately clear on examining the effigy that Lady Cobham's left hand had been lost before 1840, and it would be interesting to know whether, if this was indeed so, the wedding-ring was an embellishment dating from 1840 or from 1866.—RALPH ARNOLD, Meadow House, Cobham, Kent.

kitten. At first she had to protect it from the three other cats in the house, but after a few days these also came to accept the rabbit as part of the family. The rabbit is perfectly tame, very lively, and has no fear either of humans or of the other cats: in fact, when a bowl of bread and milk is put down for them, the little rabbit will often push its way to the front and join in the meal.

One noticeable peculiarity is that, although consuming a phenomenal quantity of food, the rabbit does not appear to grow at all. The diet consists mainly of bread and milk and various green-stuffs. Perhaps you can say whether this pigmy effect is due to some deficiency in its diet or to lack of exercise in the open. So far the rabbit has shown no desire to return to a wild state and appears to be quite content to forgo its freedom for the fleshpots of the human home.—A. E. BALSTON, 111, Old Tovil Road, Maidstone, Kent.

[The cat is a good foster-mother and has been recorded adopting many strange young. One cat reared a rat, another took charge of a ferret, a third a foxcub and, perhaps most remarkable of all, one took care of some chickens. Cats have quite often brought up young rabbits. That this rabbit does not grow so fast as it should may be due to the lack of variety in its diet. We suggest adding a little bran or hay to its rations.—ED.]

THE WEARING OF WEDDING-RINGS

SIR,—In your issue of July 25 Lord Stanhope asks when women took to wearing wedding-rings, and suggests that perhaps the custom came in with Queen Victoria. She wore her ring on the third finger of the right hand, as can be seen in her Memorial opposite Buckingham Palace, for that is the custom in many parts of Europe.

MEMORIAL TO DISUSED CLAPPERS AT SWIMBRIDGE CHURCH, DEVON

See letter: A Bell Memorial

A BELL MEMORIAL

SIR,—Though there is a lively and widespread interest in bell-ringing in this island (is there any other country where change-ringing is common?) and a good deal is heard, the non-ringer normally sees little but the records in the church tower to remind him of this particular art and mystery.

Recently, however, I noticed the unusual kind of memorial shown in the enclosed photograph, taken at Swimbridge, in North Devon. The legend runs: "The Clappers of the Old Ring. Our Duty done in Belfry High Now Voiceless Tongues at Rest we Lie." It would be interesting to know if this idea of preserving clappers is unique.

The typical Devon capital in the photograph is also worthy of note. Swimbridge church has an extremely fine fan-vault screen and a curious font-case and cover. The vicarage here was for many years occupied by one of the West Country's most famous sporting parsons, Jack Russell.—J. D. U. WARD, Rodhuish, Watchet, Somerset.

A PORTRAIT OF A STEEPLECHASER

SIR,—Since writing you the letter concerning the portrait of a steeplechaser which you were good enough to print in your issue of July 18, I have had reason to assume, on the strength of two prints by James Hunt of the Northampton Grand National of 1840, that the grey horse in question may be Cigar, winner of this race, with his owner Mr. McDonough in the saddle. Can any of your readers confirm this assumption?—P. SANTINI, Palazzo Borghese, Rome.

HABITS OF THE PORCUPINE

SIR,—May I add a footnote to Mr. Frank Illingworth's article on his meeting with a porcupine (July 4)? He does not mention the nasty fact that the spines are barbed. This makes their extraction less easy than he implies. And when they break off, they can work in pretty deep.

The reason why a porcupine will "chop up anything humans have touched" is that he is after salt; and anything with the least saline taste from perspiring hands gets chewed to pieces. Axe-handles suffer badly, sometimes being chewed right off at the head, and this can be most serious in the woods. For the same reason, no leather is safe from him, nor any salty food.

It may be one's duty to kill porcupines off as vermin in the Yukon. But no decent man in the woods will kill one unless he is hungry, because the porcupine is one of the few things you can kill after you have run out of ammunition, and somebody's life might depend on that "porky" some day.

Finally, about edibility. Old ones are supposed to be pretty terrible. I have heard of their being served to greenhorns as a joke. But the liver of even an old one is a delicacy. Nearly all woodsmen agree that the young ones are very good, provided you parboil them at least half an hour before roasting or stewing them. This is essential. They remain juicy without larding or basting, and Nessmuk, a very great camper, found them like spring lamb, only better.—DAVID BROCK, 3050, Procter Avenue, West Vancouver, B.C., Canada.

FRENCH STAINED GLASS IN ENGLAND?

SIR,—I should be grateful if you could bring to the attention of your readers the following account of a communication sent to me by the curator of the Dijon Museum, M. Pierre Quarré.

In 1806, at the time of the demolition of the Sainte-Chapelle in the palace of the dukes at Dijon, two Englishmen, a Mr. Douglas and a Mr. Taylor, then resident at Plombières, Magdalen. This was the most interesting of the windows, since probably it was from a design made by René when, a prisoner of Philippe le Bon after the Battle of Bulgnéville in 1431, he lay for some four years in that tower of the ducal palace which still bears his name.

Monsieur Quarré surmises that some of this glass may still be preserved somewhere in England and hopes that one of your readers may be able to help him to trace it.—ROBERT PARR, Saint-Germain-au-Mont-d'Or, Rhône, France.

THE SPARROW PROBLEM

SIR,—I suffer from a plague of house-sparrows and am writing to ask if you or any of your readers know of any effective way of destroying some or all of them. My house has a stone slate roof and the sparrows nest under the slates so that it is impossible to get at the nests.

The amount of damage being done in my garden to seedlings and suchlike is considerable, apart from the annoyance of having the birds fighting around the house all day.—B. G. BARNETT (Major), Dundon House, Minster Lovell, Oxfordshire.

[In our opinion the best means of reducing the number of house-sparrows is a .410 gun. Alternatively, they can be caught with a wire trap of the type that acts on the principle of a lobster trap. If other kinds of birds enter the trap they can be released unhurt.—ED.]

THE TREE OF LIFE

SIR,—One is accustomed to gruesome representations of skeletons on old tombs and tombstones, but my photograph shows an example which includes a rather imaginative touch. Beside the skeleton is the Tree of Life, from which a large limb has just been lopped; the saw is resting against the trunk of the tree. This interesting example of the monumental mason's art is in the churchyard at Warnford, Hampshire.—K. McCALL (Flt.-Lt.), Bosham Vicarage, Chichester, Sussex.

TREE WASPS' NEST ON A WALL

SIR,—During the last week of June a colony of wasps built a nest here in what appeared to me to be an unusual situation, an old retaining wall of Kent ragstone, as shown in my photograph. The nest grew rapidly from about the size of a tennis ball, when it was first noticed, until it measured approximately 2 ins. by 7 ins. The entrance was at the bottom of the heart-shaped structure.

The paper-like material of which the nest was constructed was grey, almost exactly the same colour as the surrounding rock; in fact the nest was a remarkable piece of camouflage, which loses something of its value in the photograph owing to the side lighting and deep shadows.

When I had taken my photograph I removed the nest from the wall, having first thoroughly sprayed it with insecticide. The wasps inside were caught as they emerged with spray from the gun and effectively eliminated.

To ascertain what species of wasp they were I sent several to Dr. I. H. H. Yarrow, of the Department of Entomology, British Museum (Natural History), South Kensington, who kindly commented on them as follows: "Your wasps are Vespa (Dolichovespula) sylvestris Scop. This is one of our two tree wasps, which are distinguished from our other social wasps by having the mandibles well separated from the eyes (in the others the mandibles and eye touch). The tree wasps hang their nests in small trees or bushes and the nests are always small compared with those of the other wasps. V. sylvestris will at times hang its nest under banks and I have heard that in some places underground sites are chosen, though I have not seen one thus placed. Although more local in distribution than most of our social wasps, this species is common enough where it occurs."—ROBERT H. GOODSALL, Stede Hill, Harrietsham, Kent.

OUR OLDEST COWSHED?

SIR,—The enclosed photograph of a well-buttressed building near Buckland Abbey, in south-west Devon, may be of interest to your readers. I am told that this range, now used as a cowshed and not, like the Abbey itself, under the control of the National Trust, was probably the oldest part of the Cistercian settlement there, and that it may well have been used as a dormitory and refectory while the Abbey was being built, in the latter part of the 13th century. The doorway at the near end and some of the windows (including a decorative example in the gable end, just out of the photograph) are evidently of later construction, but if the main building dates from about 1275, might it not be England's oldest cowshed?—WAYFARER, Somerset.

AN EARWIG IN THE EAR

SIR,—I remember being told by a gardener of a sure way of dealing with earwigs in one's ear (July 25). He himself had removed one by placing a ripe peach against his ear. In a matter of minutes, he said, the earwig was in the peach.—ANNE MAGEE (Miss), 69, Queen's Gate, S.W.7.

COLLECTIVE GARDENING

SIR,—You recently reported that the police of Atherstone, Warwickshire, warned householders of their statutory obligation to cultivate their gardens. Would it not be an excellent thing if everywhere enthusiastic gardeners were to club together to attend to neglected gardens? Along with their green fingers some gardeners have a sense of style and, with a number of gardens to work in, could perhaps achieve something of the effect of landscape gardening in a modified way.

In these highly-regimented days there is perhaps something to be said for seizing any opportunity that arises for spontaneous, if collective, effort, and if it be public-spirited too, no harm is done. There would also be the possibility of roping youngsters in and making them enthusiastic and so converting them from their present destructive practices. Who is to say what promise of future achievement some youngster might be thus enabled to discover in himself, or what sense of responsibility?—JACOB J. BERLIN, 22, Gordon Road, S.E. 15.

bought the stained glass. Since then all trace of it has been lost.

Among the more notable lights was that of a sanctuary window showing the Virgin accompanied by Saint John, Saint Michael and Saint John the Baptist, and below these figures were the Keys (an indication that the Chapel was directly dependent on the Holy See), the old and the new arms of the Duchy and the arms of Martin V, who was of the Roman family of the Colonna.

The last light showed the kneeling figures of Jean de Noidant, the ducal treasurer, and of his wife, Guyotte de la Perreux, who had met the cost of the general restoration of the windows in 1424. In the north transept was portrayed Jean, Seigneur de Roubaix, with his arms and device. The Le Riche Chapel—the name is that of an old Dijon family—contained windows showing Louis de la Trémoille, Sire de Joinville, wearing the Collar of the Golden Fleece, and his wife, Jacqueline d'Amboise.

In the baptistery was a representation of René d'Anjou, Duc de Bar et de Lorraine, in a mantle of scarlet and ermine, on his knees before the Pietà. A book of hours lay open before him on a prie-dieu draped with cloth of gold, and grouped behind him stood Saint Antony, Saint George and the

MASTERPIECES OF REGENCY TASTE

By CLIFFORD MUSGRAVE

THE direct historical interest of many of the exhibits is an important aspect of this year's Regency Exhibition in the Royal Pavilion at Brighton.

Once more the banqueting room is laid out with silver-gilt and silver as for a banquet of the Prince Regent and forms in itself a considerable exhibition of Regency silversmiths' and goldsmiths' work. Among many fresh exhibits are groups from the Duke of Wellington and also from Attingham, lent by Lady Berwick and the National Trust. The latter collection includes silver-gilt by Paul Storr, and by Benjamin and James Smith from the ambassadorial plate of William Hill, representative of King George III at the Court of Naples.

Two vases lent by Lloyd's, originally presentations from Lloyd's Patriotic Fund, are tokens of the sense of London underwriters of the services rendered by naval captains of the day "in protecting the trade of the country." One of the vases, by Benjamin and James Smith, hall-marked for 1795, is one of those which were presented by Lloyd's to the captain of every ship that took part in the Battle of Trafalgar.

There are as well important loans from the Worshipful Company of Goldsmiths and from the Marquess of Londonderry.

The outstanding exhibit, however, and one which has not previously been seen at the Pavilion, is the great silver-gilt table centre-piece lent among other exhibits from the Mansion House by permission of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London. In this handsome object the work of two great Georgian silversmiths is united.

The later craftsman, Paul Storr, made for Rundell's in 1811 the rectangular base and platform, which has paw feet and supporting winged gryphons of the City Arms at the corners, and the arms of the City in relief on the sides. This base supports an earlier piece, an exquisite Rococo épergne by Paul de Lamerie, who worked in London from 1712 to 1751. It takes the form of a double bowl, the upper supported on a lattice gallery, and has branches of broken scrolls terminating in female figures, for eight lights and four hanging baskets. The decoration of the bowls and of the scroll feet is in a design of shells, scrolls and female masks, and on the sides of the lower bowl are male portrait profiles in relief. The candle sconces on Lamerie's delicate branches are additions by Storr.

The collection of kitchen copperware originally belonging to the 1st Duke of Wellington, from Apsley House, is now on long-term loan from the London Museum to the Royal Pavilion, and is seen with the whole of its 600 items on view. This famous batterie de cuisine was last used on the eve of the 1914 war, when the long era of richness, profusion and pageantry of which it had formed a part came to an end.

To this already impressive display, staged in the Great Kitchen with its original equipment, and with the mechanism of rotating spits in working order, have been added 39 pieces of copperware marked Syon House and dated 1829, on permanent loan from the Hon. Mrs. Ionides.

The Napoleonic theme of many exhibits is apparent, particularly in the collection of vases now on long-term loan to the Royal Pavilion from the Marquess of Londonderry. Originally the property of Viscount Castlereagh, later 2nd Marquess of Londonderry, and his half-brother Charles, who eventually became 3rd Marquess, they recall the period when the former, as Foreign Secretary from 1812 until 1822, pursued the foreign policy which united the kingdoms of Europe with England against Napoleon. Charles, as Minister representing the Allies at Berlin in 1813, ably seconded Castlereagh's diplomacy and took part in the Congresses of Vienna.

The most important of the vases is of Sèvres porcelain, 4 feet 6 inches high, richly gilt and painted with design of flowers and birds. The handles are set with medallions of classical female heads, and the vase is encircled with ormolu mounts designed by Thomire. Originally the vase stood on a pedestal inscribed: "THE GIFT OF HIS MOST CHRISTIAN MAJESTY LOUIS 18th, KING OF FRANCE AND NAVARRE, ON THE SIGNATURE OF THE PEACE OF PARIS, 30th OF MAY, 1814, TO ROBERT VISCOUNT CASTLEREAGH."

Three large vases are of Vienna porcelain, urn-shaped, with beautifully chased ormolu scroll handles in the form of serpents, and bear panels representing scenes of ancient Roman history painted by Leopold Lieb. These were probably acquired by the 3rd Marquess when British Ambassador in Vienna between 1814 and 1822, as was also a bowl of Vienna porcelain decorated with a frieze of amorino figures. A smaller pair of ormolu mounted vases, of Russian porcelain, made at the Imperial Factory, St. Petersburg, are painted with scenes of fishing boats and figures and signed V. Stolelov, 1836. These were given by the Emperor Nicholas I of Russia to the 3rd Marquess when he and the Marchioness visited Russia in 1837.

Historical appeal combines strongly with aesthetic interest in the collection of Mrs. Fitzherbert's own possessions, lent by the Earl and Countess of Portarlington. It includes miniatures of Mrs. Fitzherbert and of the Prince Regent as a young man, by Richard Cosway, and the wedding ring of their secret marriage in 1785. From the same source come also the two important but little-known works of Sir Joshua Reynolds, of about the same year. One is a superb portrait of Mrs. Fitzherbert, the other of the Prince in an unaccustomed warlike pose with the flames of battle reflected around him.

Professor A. E. Richardson has lent an important group of Mrs. Fitzherbert's own Hepplewhite satinwood furniture and a pair of chinoiserie tables designed by Holland for Oakley, near Woburn. These are seen in a special decorative setting of grey-green and white that coolly evokes the pre-Regency years when the Prince of Wales first brought Mrs. Fitzherbert to Brighton.

French furniture of the First Empire was to be found in the Pavilion in the later phases, especially in bedrooms, and in the Duke of Clarence's bedroom are now to be seen some important Empire pieces, again in their own special decorative setting, together with some especially interesting furniture upholstered in yellow needlework with portraits of Napoleon, Josephine, Marie Louise of Austria and her son the Duke of Reichstadt.

The collection of personal possessions, pictures and memorial objects associated with the Princess Charlotte of Wales, chiefly belonging to Sir Eardley Holland, has historical links of a more poignant kind with one whose days at the Royal Pavilion were probably among the happiest of her tragically short life.

A collection of furniture illustrating almost every aspect of Regency furnishing taste, from Sheraton to Thomas Hope and George Smith, including a number of pieces of outstanding interest and quality, occupies the whole of the State and private apartments.

THE YELLOW PERIL By RONALD CARDEW DUNCAN

WHEN one becomes old, one is apt to spend much time living in the past and reviving memories of those days which seem so good compared with those of the present. The true horse-lover, naturally, likes to let his thoughts rest on the horses he once possessed in days gone by, and if he has been a polo player, he will find much pleasure in browsing on the memory of his ponies and the various polo tournaments in which he took part. It is nice to bring back to life some specially exciting moment in a match or some pony which had endearing qualities above the ordinary. Remembering happy times and forgetting the unhappy ones surely helps to form the basis of contentment in old age.

There was one pony for which I had a particular regard, and as I came by him in rather an unusual way and played on him in many tournaments, the story might be of some interest.

I had been sent to command a battalion of Gurkhas at a place called Dardoni in the Tochi Valley, North-West Frontier Province, Pakistan, close to the turbulent trans-border territory where the King's writ did not run and the tribesmen acknowledged no rule except that of the rifle or the sword. About two miles away was the fort of Miranshah, where an irregular corps called the Tochi Scouts, a splendid body of men recruited from across the border, was stationed.

A detachment of this unit was mounted on sturdy country-bred ponies and trained as mounted infantry. There was a mud polo ground adjoining the fort, and the British officers attached to the Tochi Scouts used to play polo on those mounted infantry ponies which might be called, in the broadest sense of the term, suitable. Many of the ponies in the detachment were, of course, entirely unplayable, becoming completely bewildered on the ground or being either bolters or shy of stick or ball. I think I am correct in stating that none of them had had any proper training for the game and that those that were played on merely learnt from experience. It was remarkable how many of them took to the game and became manageable in quite a short time.

One has to realise that when a pony is played in a game of polo he is being made to do things that he would never attempt to do if he were left to his own devices, and when one remembers that the normal polo pony will have received long and careful schooling to accustom him to the idea of what he will have to do, it was amazing to find that so many of these ponies were at all playable.

During my short stay at Dardoni, the Officer Commanding the Tochi Scouts kindly lent me a couple of ponies and I had some most enjoyable games on them. I remember that one of them was not too easy to play and that I had some anxious moments on him, but the other one, a light-weight, well-made dun, suited me down to the ground. There was no doubt that he liked the game and he would canter on to the ground with his ears pricked and an excitement that communicated itself to me. The shape of his body suggested wiry strength and energy, his action was good and, what was most surprising to find among these ponies, he had a beautiful mouth.

On return to my own battalion at Abbottabad, I was told that we had entered for the Murree Brewery polo tournament, which was to take place in the near future. I possessed two ponies at the time, but one was a rather doubtful quantity, being unsound and apt to go lame at any time, so that I was badly in need of a third. Time was short and ponies, suitable not only from a playing point of view, but also to my slender purse, were hard to come by. Suddenly I remembered the little dun at Dardoni and, without hesitation, I sent a telegram to the Officer Commanding the Tochi Scouts asking if I might buy him. I did not know the price which might be asked, but, if he was obtainable, I was confident that it would not be a vast amount. Anyhow, I had now set my heart on getting him. I followed the telegram up with a letter, in which I explained the urgent necessity for that pony. To my great relief, a reply came back to say that I could have him for three hundred rupees, and if I agreed to that sum he would be sent off to me immediately. This was a lower figure than I expected, so naturally I replied that I was delighted, and I waited for his arrival with suppressed excitement.

About a week later I saw him being led up the drive to my bungalow, and I went out to welcome him. He looked in splendid condition, with a glossy coat and bright eyes. We named him at once the Yellow Peril.

The following afternoon I played on him and he entirely came up to expectation. He was just as keen as ever to get on to the ground, and he appeared to enjoy the game every bit as much as I did. He was small and light compared to the other ponies, but he made up for lack of height and weight by his amazing handiness. In comparison with the other ponies, none of whom approached first-class standard, he was quite fast; he was as agile as a cat and turned on the proverbial sixpence. He gave me a beautiful ride that afternoon and I looked forward to many more rides on him.

I got to like the Yellow Peril more and more, and I think he liked me. He was a gallant, fearless little pony and he always gave of his best whether it was in a tournament or a practice game. I played him in several tournaments and not only did he never let me down, but he so infected me with his great enthusiasm that I played better on him than on any other pony I had ever owned.

In due course my turn for furlough came round and I booked my passage to England. At the time I was in my usual state of financial difficulty, so that I realised that, much as I disliked it, I must sell my polo ponies if I was to have anything of a good time in England. I hated the thought of losing the Yellow Peril more than I can say, but a Gunner officer immediately offered me 1,200 rupees for him and I felt it would be madness not to accept.

In those days Cavalry officers, who had all the facilities for training and schooling ponies and had the requisite knowledge of the good and bad points of a pony, often sold their ponies at a large profit, and some of those officers who had not much in the way of private means were thus able to afford the comparatively expensive life in a Cavalry regiment.

It was, however, unusual for an Infantry officer to do this, so that I should have considered myself lucky in selling the Yellow Peril for no less than four times what I had paid for him. I had become so fond of him, however, and he had served me so well that my only thought was one of regret at losing him, and I cursed the fates that I had not the wherewithal to keep him. He was a grand little animal and I never owned one that suited me better.

THE STORY OF ENGLISH MACES

By G. BERNARD HUGHES

UNRULY crowds in London of the Middle Ages were roughly quelled by officials called catchpoles, who were appointed by the local authorities. Each of these officers was armed with a mace, a metal-headed stave of the type used as a fighting weapon in light warfare from the 11th until early in the 16th century. Eden noted in 1555 that "such maces as are used in the warres" were made of laton. The word mace is derived from the French masse or massue, a club.

Pictorial records of such events as the Battle of Hastings show soldiers armed with globular-headed or blade-mounted maces. From the time of Edward I (1272-1307) the English fighting mace might be of wrought iron, cast bronze or other alloy. This was topped by a murderous war-head made more effective with four short vertical arc-shaped knife-blades of steel, capable of tearing into strong armour. Several illuminated manuscripts in the Royal collection illustrate such fighting maces, apparently of bronze.

In 1327 it became illegal for citizens to settle personal disputes with the aid of maces: their use, however, continued in tournaments and jousts, and the combatants were clothed in quilted garments padded with felt three fingers thick. Jousting maces possessed staves of resilient wood with hilts resembling those of swords and were fitted with looped cords.

Monarchs from the time of Richard I (1189-1199) were protected by bands of armoured guards known as sergeants-at-arms, who were equipped with maces and bows and arrows. In regal surroundings it was only natural that the maces should become enriched with ornament. By the 13th century the iron was encased in silver plate in such a way that the mace might be mistaken for solid silver, or gold when gilded. Possession of the mace was deemed sufficient authority for a sergeant-at-arms to make an arrest. At first the band consisted of twenty-four men of good birth: later their number was so increased that in 1390 it became necessary to fix a limit of thirty.

Civic and other bodies soon endeavoured to lend dignity to their office by introducing one or more maces into their local proceedings. The King's sergeants-at-arms regarded this as adversely affecting their status and in 1344 they petitioned Edward III through the Commons "that no man carry within cities or boroughs or any other town, maces ferruled with silver, except the king's sergeants, but that they may carry maces ferruled with copper and no other metal, and wooden staves as they were wont to carry in olden times whereby men might know the said sergeants from others." The King replied: "It is agreed that the thing be done, save the sergeants of the city of London, who shall be able to carry their mace within their franchise of the city and before the mayor of London in the king's presence."

1.—15th-CENTURY MACE OF HEDON, YORKSHIRE. An iron core with a six-bladed war-head, cased in silver. (Below) 2.—THE SOUTHAMPTON MACE: AN EXAMPLE OF THE TRANSITIONAL PERIOD IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE MACE FROM A WEAPON OF WAR TO A SYMBOL OF AUTHORITY. ABOUT 1500

Not until 1354 were London's sergeants-at-arms permitted "to carry gilt, or silver, or silvered maces adorned with the ensigns of our armes or of others everywhere in the said city." Similar privileges were granted to York in 1396, Norwich in 1403 and Chester in 1506, and sergeants-at-mace were empowered to carry maces before the mayors of these places in the King's presence.

By the mid-15th century maces carried by sergeants-at-arms had become elaborate pieces of the silversmith's craft. H.M. the Queen possesses an illuminated picture on parchment depicting Henry VI (1422-1461) and his Queen receiving the gift of a book from John Talbot, Earl of Shrewsbury. The sergeant-at-arms carries a silver-gilt mace measuring about three feet in length with the head in the form of a large crown, a miniature of that worn by the monarch. Sergeants-at-arms of the present day carry very similar maces.

Despite the enactment of 1344, silver-cased maces were used in other towns. At least a dozen silver-cased civic maces of the 15th century still exist, and six of them, from Hedon, Newtown, Southampton, Shaftesbury, Stratford-on-Avon and Burford, are included in the Exhibition of Corporation Plate of England and Wales now being held at Goldsmiths Hall and remaining open to the public until August 30. Here may be seen a chronological sequence of forty-two civic maces.

The history of civic maces begins about the middle of the 13th century. So far as is known they first resembled ordinary war maces, with the plain shaft gradually expanding into a slender trumpet shape to form a handle, finished at the end with a flat or slightly convex silver disc bearing an engraved or enamelled coat-of-arms. The head was fitted with four or more steel blades cut with serrated edges. The Colyford (Devon) mace is in this form, and consists of a single length of iron headed with a four-sided set of notched blades. Such maces were usually encased with silver.

It is important to realise, however, that the change in function soon entirely reversed the design. As a weapon, the mace had naturally been carried with the war-head upward; several contemporary manuscripts in H.M. the Queen's collection show the sergeant-at-arms carrying the mace with the war-head against his shoulder. But when the war-head was reduced to no more than a symbol, the other end, bearing the coat-of-arms, naturally became the important feature, received the main decorative embellishments and was carried upward. In the Goldsmiths' exhibition this is most interestingly illustrated by two 15th-century examples: the oldest civic mace on view—that of Hedon, Yorkshire (Fig. 1)—and the Southampton mace (Fig. 2), which, although later than that of Hedon, demonstrates more clearly the change of emphasis in design and consequent change in the method of carrying this interesting emblem of authority. Thus in the Southampton mace, made late in the 15th century, the war-head has still been treated as the important feature of the mace, but the murderous blades have been reduced to open-work silver flanges containing scrollwork built from flat strips of metal. This emerges from a bell-shaped expansion of the shaft casing surrounded by three cast lions sejant and encircled with cresting composed of alternating crosses and fleurs-de-lis. The shaft ferrules are highly convex knobs, but these may be replacements of earlier ring ferrules. What is still in this example the lower end of the mace consists of a shallow coronet from which rises a short cylinder containing a flat disc engraved with the arms of France modern and England quarterly in the reign of Henry VII (1485-1509). This may be regarded as a late example of a transition piece.

In the earlier Hedon specimen the change is observed completed. The war-head has become sufficiently unimportant to be carried downward, while the end bearing the coat-of-arms has been enriched, though it received further emphasis in Elizabethan days. This specimen has an overall length of twenty-five inches. The silver casing, like that of the majority of maces, is strengthened with two plainly moulded rings or ferrules. The iron vestige of a war-head, an extension of the core, is six-bladed: possibly this was originally French or close plated in silver to match the casing. The other end of the casing is enriched with a coronet of strawberry leaves from which rises a conical head decorated with three applied lions rampant. The position of the lions leaves no doubt that this is to be regarded as the head of the mace. The flat top of the head, displaying a shield of the Royal arms, originally enamelled, is encircled by a cresting of six-petalled flowers, each with two leaves. This mace is believed to have been made when Henry V granted the town a charter in 1413. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth I the head was surmounted by an arched crown and orb.

Civic maces were generally carried with the coat-of-arms upward from about the year 1500, and thus conformed to the custom followed by the King's sergeants-at-arms for more than a century. The Arundel mace (Fig. 3), one of a pair, is an excellent example of the reversed civic mace belonging to the period of Henry VIII. The rim of its hemispherical head is encircled with foliage cresting enclosing a silver boss engraved with the Royal arms. The arms of Henry VIII have been replaced by those of Charles II and his, in all probability, superseded the arms of the Commonwealth. The flanges of a fighting mace are no more than suggested by the fluted lozenge knob at the other end of the staff.

More frequently the 16th-century civic mace terminated in a more decorative reminder of its earlier purpose as a weapon, such as two, four, six or eight pierced blades, cast openwork brackets or openwork scroll flanges. These were placed vertically between the lower ferrule of the staff and a small ornamental finial. As the century advanced, this decoration decreased in size until by 1625 the mace ended in a globular or pear-shaped knob, often with a flat plate beneath, which was engraved with the arms of the town. For a further quarter of a century, however, a pair of cast and chased scrollwork brackets might be soldered to this knob.

Meanwhile, what had become the head of the civic mace was made larger and more decorative than formerly during the reign of Charles II, and in some instances it was thought necessary to support the extra weight of metal by soldering two, three or four scrolled brackets immediately below it. The Evesham mace (Fig. 4), bearing the London hall-mark for 1619, is typical of this period and measures twenty-nine inches in length. The plain shaft has spherical knobs at the ends and another in the middle. The deep, cup-shaped head, raised from the plate, has the four Royal badges applied to its surface and can be unscrewed for use as a loving-cup on occasions of ceremonial feasting. The rim is surmounted by an arched crown enclosing an enamelled shield of the Royal arms. The orb supports a small coronet instead of the usual cross.

This is an early example of a civic great mace such as was carried before the mayor as representative of the sovereign and as chief magistrate of the municipality. Sergeants-at-mace were usually empowered to carry such a mace in silver or gilt. A sergeant's mace, although primarily intended to be a symbol of authority in making an arrest, might also be borne for dignity before the bailiff of an important town which did not possess a mayor. A pair of maces, slightly enlarged versions of sergeant's maces, might be used: such were known officially as great maces.

As a rule, however, a great mace differs from the sergeant's in size, shape and date. Sergeants-at-mace appear to have played no further part in civic ceremonial after 1650, and in a number of instances their maces were converted into great maces, such as that of Dover. The sergeant's place was taken by a mace-bearer, who carried the great mace before a town mayor or bailiff. Certain sergeant's maces known to have been made during the reign of Charles II are lengthened versions of preceding types or miniature copies of crowned great maces. The average length of a fighting mace had been about two feet. The earliest civic maces appear to have averaged fourteen inches overall. This was increased during the reign of James I to about eighteen inches; afterwards they measured about twenty-one inches. Great maces were considerably longer and heavier. The great mace made for Winchester in 1722 by Benjamin Pyne measures five feet three inches in length. This and the mace belonging to the City of London are the two largest civic maces in the country.

ordered a new mace to be designed for the House of Commons. This was made by the silversmith Thomas Maundy under Cromwell's supervision. So satisfied was he with the result that he ordered "all other great Maces to be used in this Commonwealth to be made according to the same forme and paterne." A pair of maces belonging to Marlborough, Wiltshire, made by Tobias Coleman (Fig. 5) are handsome examples of Maundy's Commonwealth type. They remain unaltered except that an orb and cross replace the original cushion and acorn. The arches of the crown superficially resemble the regal style, but are unjewelled. Around the coronet is the inscription "THE . FREEDOM . OF . ENGLAND . BY . GODS . BLESSING . RESTORED," but the original date of 1652 has been altered to 1660. The crest of the coronet, instead of consisting of alternating crosses and fleurs-de-lis, is composed of an intertwined cable containing shields bearing the cross of St. George and the harp of Ireland, such as appeared on Commonwealth coinage. The head is embossed with cartouches containing St. George's cross and the Irish harp alternating with the town arms. The shaft has a pair of spirally gadrooned flattened knobs and is chased with oak branches and acorns entwined with a ribbon.

The boss within the head displays the arms of Charles II. It was customary after the Restoration in 1660 for any boss bearing the Commonwealth arms to be reversed and a new coat-of-arms engraved. Orb and cross now replaced the non-regal cushion and acorn above the crown arches and these were often replaced by others of a more regal type. Some towns had their maces entirely remade.

By far the greater number of existing great maces date from this period, and their decorated shafts and crowned heads were embossed and chased with Royal badges. The Newcastle-under-Lyme mace of 1680 (Fig. 6) is one of a pair presented to the town by William Leveson-Gower, who represented the borough in three successive Parliaments. These replaced maces of wrought iron, which no doubt would originally have been French plated in silver.

In the reign of Queen Anne, mace shafts of baluster form embossed with foliage were made. The earliest now remaining belongs to Gravesend and bears the London hall-mark of 1709 and the maker's mark of Benjamin Pyne. It was probably Pyne who introduced the baluster to mace shafts. By the middle of the 18th century some mace heads were urn-shaped, most of them being the work of William Shaw and William Priest.

For the past two centuries silversmiths have continued to make civic maces. The Berwick-upon-Tweed mace of 1952 (Fig. 7), designed by C. J. Shiner and made by Wakeley and Wheeler, shows a most interesting recognition of the original purpose of the mace as a weapon to be carried with the war-head upward. In this finely proportioned piece a highly stylised version of the fighting blades is combined with Berwick's new heraldic emblems.

DOMESTIC POTTERY OF ANCIENT CHINA

Written by LADY INGRAM and Illustrated by SIR HERBERT INGRAM

1.—EWER WITH A SHORT SPOUT. T'ANG PERIOD. (Middle) 2.—GOURD-SHAPED WINE-EWER: THE HANDLE HAS A RAISED SCROLL DESIGN. SUNG PERIOD. (Right) 3.—LARGE EWER WITH AN ANIMAL-HEADED HANDLE AND A COPPER RIM. T'ANG PERIOD

It can be seen from the many pottery objects for domestic use found in Chinese tombs that the articles in everyday use in ancient China—even as long ago as two thousand years—were eminently practical, as well as beautiful. They were invariably of pleasing shape, and the designs used to decorate them were both bold and original, but their most striking characteristic is that they were so well and sensibly constructed for the purpose for which they were intended. That such a large quantity of these objects has survived is due to the ancient Chinese custom of burying in their tombs everything that might be of use to the deceased on reaching the spirit world; being ancestor worshippers, they held tombs in inviolable reverence.

The tombs always contained vessels to hold liquids. These all have spouts and lips so designed that the liquid can be poured from them easily, without any dribbling or spilling, which is more than can be said of the majority of modern tea-pots and jugs. This excellent behaviour is due to the spout's always being placed on the top of the shoulder of the vessel. It therefore did not matter of what shape or length the spouts were: the liquid poured straight out.

Sometimes the ewers were of simple shape, with high shoulders and a very short spout (Fig. 1). Sometimes they were more elegant, with long, graceful spouts (Fig. 2) and handles of various designs, shaped like a twisted rope or having an animal's head introduced (Fig. 3). Occasionally the ewer was of a special design, such as the one illustrated in Fig. 5. This has the handle hollowed out to take a wooden attachment, which would allow the heated vessel to be lifted with comfort from a charcoal fire.

Some of the vessels used for wine are exactly like tea-pots (Fig. 6), but tea was not served in them. Tea was served direct in the cups in which it would be drunk.

Some ewers and jugs had lips instead of spouts and these lips were beautifully and carefully designed, and also gave no trouble with the pouring. There is about some of these a strong indication of Greek influence (Fig. 3), which is also found in the early mortuary figures of horses.

Covered oil jars with lids were in common use, and are very decorative owing to their excellent shape, and the rich orange, blue or green glaze with which they were wholly or partially covered. Smaller jars and pots, similar to those now used for jam, have also been found. These are usually off white and thinly glazed. This attractive off white pottery with various tinges and tints, so different from the hard white glaze of modern manufacture, was used for many domestic articles: for instance, the useful dish with the conveniently shaped handle for passing round sweetmeats (Fig. 7), which has a lovely pale rosy tinge and an under-glaze decoration on the handle.

Oil lamps of various types have been found. They nearly all had shallow pans or cups to contain a small quantity of oil in which a wick floated. A pair of small lamps (they may have been used as candlesticks) can be seen in Fig. 8. These are made in Ying Ching ware, the lovely, delicate, pale blue-green glaze of which is so aptly described by the words Ying Ching, which means "the colour of the sky after rain." A more elaborate type of lamp is illustrated in Fig. 9. This is in the shape of a sturdy, crouching lion, bearing on his back the oil cup. This lion is typical of the animals found in Yueh pottery, converted into various beautiful and domestic uses. They vary in colour from pale tawny brown, through various shades, to a sage green, somewhat similar to celadon.

The frog was a favourite animal used to form articles of domestic use. In Fig. 11 can be seen a vessel for water used for writing with ink. On the top of the frog's back is the opening for filling it, and the animal's under-lip is extended to form a little saucer on which a small quantity of water could be tipped, and into which the brush used for writing could conveniently be dipped, so as to get the requisite amount of moisture. A more ordinary type of writing palette, possibly also made to hold brushes, is just a round tray with a rim and stands on three feet formed of handsomely modelled animal masks. Feet of this kind were in favourite use in the many and varied bulb bowls which were so prolific in the Sung period (907-1368). These bulb bowls are usually covered with a thick celadon glaze, which tones perfectly with the colours of flowers, from the vaunting yellow of an emperor daffodil to the exquisite white of lily of the valley or snowdrops.

The ancient Chinese slept on pillows made of pottery (Fig. 12). These look uncompromisingly hard and uninviting, but if one places one of these pillows on the floor, as the Chinese did, and settles one's head on to it, it will be found surprisingly comfortable, and it seems to fill in the crannies of one's neck. Another aid to comfort, although it is not known whether it was used in bed, was a pottery hot-water bottle. These were much like Victorian stone hot-water bottles, except that they were decorated. They were generally round in shape, with the opening facing upwards, which made them less likely to leak. A typical example is illustrated in Fig. 10. It is covered with a thick black treacle glaze and decorated with an attractive leaf design.

A bottle of a similar type used for a different purpose is the pilgrim bottle (Fig. 13). This could be slung round the neck of the pilgrim by a cord attached to two little rings on the shoulders of the bottle. The pottery acted rather like a vacuum flask, and it must have had many uses.

Cosmetic boxes must have been almost as popular in ancient China as vanity cases are to-day. They are of many shapes and sizes, some being just a single box similar to a powder-box, but the most attractive have three compartments (Fig. 14), possibly for henna, kohl and a form of chalk. They are all of dainty design, well suited to discriminating feminine taste.

MOTORING NOTES

MORE ALTERNATIVE ROUTES By J. EASON GIBSON

SEVERAL readers have commented on my recent article suggesting an alternative to the Great North Road, and have asked for a similar article on ways of avoiding the worst sections of A49 and A6—Warrington, Wigan, Preston and Lancaster—when motoring towards the north from Bristol and the south-west, or from London for that matter. The question of deciding whether to consider the use of an alternative route or to stick to the recognised main road seems to me to depend entirely on whether one intends to do such a journey as London to Glasgow, or Bristol to Edinburgh, in the day. If speed is of real importance, there is little doubt that the main roads—between the places I have mentioned at any rate—are in the end the fastest, provided one is prepared to put up with the ugliness of some of the country and the more built-up districts with large smoky factories everywhere. My choice would be to take the right fork on leaving Shrewsbury, on to A53 instead of A49, as though heading for Market Drayton, and about two miles north of Shrewsbury turn off on to B5062 to Newport, where a half-left turn on to A519 should be taken for Eccleshall. There one turns right on A520, which leads through Stone to Leek, where one rejoins A53 to cross the moors to Buxton.

From here to Keighley the route is perhaps rather complicated, as one works through the gap between the mass of Manchester and Oldham on the west and Huddersfield, Dewsbury and Bradford on the east, but a little concentrated study of the map beforehand will make it quite easy for most drivers. From Buxton A624 should be taken, which leads through Chapel-missed, in just over a mile (on the outskirts of Halifax) one will join A646 as it leaves the town. This road should be followed to Hebden Bridge, where the right turning, on to A6038, will lead to Haworth and Keighley.

Now the country really opens out and one is away from the signs of industrial development as after Keighley one drives along Airedale, with the moors of Keighley and Rembalds to one's sides. From here the road by Skipton to Settle is obviously clear, and on again to Kirkby Lonsdale and one's destination. Thence one can aim for Kendal and the Lakes or the North, alternatively if one wants to reach the coast and the wilder hills to the west of the popular areas, the cut across by Milnthorpe and Levens should be taken towards Ulverston.

There are innumerable alternative ways throughout the country, but one should remember when attempting to find one that even the best map is not infallible in indicating precisely how good the road may be. The old army slogan "Time spent on reconnaissance is rarely wasted" is worth bearing in mind. My reason for stressing the importance of checking any proposed alternative is that there are few alternative routes which are in fact quicker than the main road, so that if speed is essential great care should, I repeat, be used before leaving the principal roads. If on the other hand the avoidance of industrial areas is one's main consideration, there are many ways to be chosen from.

The outstanding example of an alternative way which is both pleasanter and faster is the route to the north-west from London, which avoids that uninteresting, dangerous and slow A5—the Holyhead road. Unfortunately this alternative is becoming increasingly popular, and is much busier than it was even four years ago, but it is still very much to be preferred to the principal road. Whether one is heading for Birmingham, Coventry or the extreme north-west of Wales it is worth taking a lot of initial trouble to avoid A5. This way out of Town can also be used to avoid Western Avenue and the busyness of that route as far as High Wycombe.

The way I suggest is by Aylesbury and Bicester, where, if one wants to head westwards for Worcester, B4030 should be taken, through Steeple Aston and Church Enstone, when one can join A44 at Chipping Norton for Evesham and Worcester. If, on the other hand, one is using this way to reach Birmingham or Coventry A41 should be taken to Banbury, where the route straight on by A423 will lead to Coventry, or a left turn at the northern end of Banbury will take one on A422 to Stratford-on-Avon. Once again, depending on which part of Birmingham one wants to reach, there is no need to follow the Birmingham signposts blindly. If one's destination is the centre or the east end, A34 through Henley-in-Arden should be taken, but if the west end near Longbridge is required it is much better to take A422 through Redditch, as this brings one in without having to become involved in the peculiarities of the Birmingham one-way circuit. To me it seems unlikely that anyone other than the designer of this circuit fully understands it: certainly a stranger to Birmingham becomes completely confused in a matter of moments because of the peculiar signs which seem to confine themselves to purely local names, so that once one has started following the circuit it is almost impossible to remain correctly orientated.

Incidentally an alternative to going through Worcester and probably Ludlow, if one is heading for North Wales, is to follow the route for west Birmingham until just after Alcester, where the left turning on to B4090 should be taken to Droitwich, whence the very pleasant road along the valley of the Teme will take one by way of Tenbury to join A49 about half-way between Leominster and Ludlow. This route has no striking advantages, but one does avoid Worcester, and passes through a countryside not very well known. It is peculiar how many of the most interesting and pleasant roads in Britain prove to be lateral roads running east and west—which one notices also in France and Italy.

fairly regular irritation of repeated restricted areas. If on the other hand, two days are to be taken over such journeys, there is no doubt that the alternative route is worth any little trouble one may be caused in first learning its complications.

Many motorists from the London district regard either A5 or the route by Wigan, Preston and Lancaster as being the correct way to the Lake District, while most motorists from Bristol think they must use the latter route if they are heading for either the Lakes or Carlisle and the North. If I were heading for the Lakes from London, I would choose to head due north to about Wetherby, Yorkshire, using the alternative to the Great North Road (described in detail in COUNTRY LIFE of July 4) and then turn westwards by Harewood, Skipton, Settle and Kirkby Lonsdale. From all points of view this is a most useful route, and on more than one occasion when I have used it I have found that, without driving any faster than I would estimate is the standard of the average driver, one can easily penetrate well into the Lake District within twelve hours of leaving London. This may still be farther than many motorists like to do in one day, but this route has the advantage of having pleasant, well placed stopping-places for the night.

Finding an alternative way from Bristol is more difficult, and when it is found one must be prepared to accept the fact that much time will be taken up in avoiding the unpleasant areas. A large détour is required, since as soon as one tries to leave A49 one seems to be in even en-le-Frith to Glossop, where a left turning takes one on to A51. This should be followed through Hollingworth to the village of Mottram—about 4½ miles beyond Glossop, where a right turn should be taken on to the Stalybridge road. On entering Stalybridge great care is necessary. If the map is studied, it will be seen that there are two right-hand turnings leading towards Oldham and that they are separated by about only one hundred yards. The first of these, that going by way of Millbrook, should be taken. After a little over 3½ miles the main road will be rejoined at a cross-roads: one should cross straight over this and, although the road is signposted Huddersfield, follow it until the village of Middle Mill. There, immediately after one has passed under the railway bridge, the left turning should be taken for Delph, where the road straight through, signposted Denshaw and Rochdale, should be followed as far as Denshaw, where the main road A672 should be taken to the right towards Halifax. Care should be taken to avoid the first right turning on entering the village; wait until you have passed the church on your right and then take the turning indicated.

A672 leads across Moss Moor to Barkisland, where A58 joins in from the left, and, still heading towards Halifax, this should be followed to Sowerby Bridge. All the way from Barkisland to Sowerby Bridge the railway line marches to the right of the road, but as soon as the road passes beneath the railway bridge a relatively insignificant left turning will take one on to join A646 for Hebden Bridge. Even if this turning is

A CAUSERIE ON BRIDGE

VULNERABLE POINT

MY excuse for dwelling so long on our prospects of beating the Americans is the interest shown in the subject by COUNTRY LIFE readers. An experienced old-timer, for instance, writes as follows:—

"How is it then that the Americans win—not invariably, as witness the Crowninshield match—but most of the time? Are they better dummy or defence players? I think not. Are they better teamed? This may be so—I don't know. Are they tougher-fibred? One suspects so; in other words, the dividing line between the amateur and professional, as in all other American activities, is very ill-defined."

To this I would say that it is impossible to define professionalism at Bridge in any country. The player with some nominal "occupation", who puts in ten solid hours a day at rubber Bridge for high stakes, is an amateur—but duplicate does not attract him, since money stakes are barred. On the other hand, a man like Charles H. Goren, who makes his living out of teaching and writing Bridge, is presumably a professional—but I doubt whether Goren finds time to play more than one session per week.

Example hands, perhaps, are more illuminating. One deal tells pretty well the Bermuda story of 1950.

With some 30 boards to go and the Americans leading by 4,000-odd, the British players struck a truly inspired spell. On hand after hand we outbid the enemy, and one in particular led everyone present to believe that the full arrears might be wiped out.

First, the British East-West pair in Room 1 had to find a trump fit for a vulnerable Five Diamonds, after the opponents had opened, in circumstances where few pairs would even visualise a game. Second, the declarer ran into an "impossible" distribution. Third, in spite of some brilliant dummy play, the contract was only made through a mistake by a defender.

A British gain of 600-odd seemed inevitable. Yet the hand showed a swing of 100 points to U.S.A.! In Room 2, during some general conversation, our South player took his hand from the board and opened as dealer with One Spade on the following:—

♠ K Q 9 7 6 2 ♥ J 9 7 ♦ 10 3 2 ♣ 5

No, this was not a playful experiment—our players do not believe in first-in-hand psychics or semi-psychics. It was simply a momentary loss of concentration. West passed, North bid Two Clubs and East doubled for a take-out. East-West were vulnerable, North-South were not.

Had South bid Two Spades over the double, his slip of the tongue would have shown a profit. Neither opponent could double—he must, in any event, make seven tricks. North would not have bid again, and the opponents would have been content to make a part-score.

But South was so conscious of having deceived his partner with the opening bid that his only thought was to pass. West was in a fine position to pass for penalties, having five Clubs and a useful hand, so North had to toil in Two Clubs doubled and was held to four tricks for a loss of 700 points, as against the English gain of 600 at the other table.

It is fair to say that the American East-West pair would not have bid up to Five Diamonds and, if they had, the contract would not have been played so well (by declarer) and defended so badly as in Room 1. But—I have never seen a case of loss of concentration by an American international. Furthermore, if such a thing should ever occur, the player would probably find some way of capitalising on his mistake, as our South player might have done in Room 2.

To put the case in a nutshell, several players on whom our selectors pin their faith are going through a phase. This is not easy to describe in a few words, but there is a typical example from the recent British Bridge League trials:—

West
♠ A 7
♥ 3
♦ K Q J 10 8
♣ A 10 9 7 3

East
♠ K Q 6 5 3
♥ K 6 4
♦ A 7 2
♣ K 4

East opened with a vulnerable One Spade and West made the wise move of forcing with Three Diamonds. This was a case of making life easy for partner. Over a simple take-out of Two Diamonds, East would be unable to indicate both a rebiddable Spade suit and the general quality of his hand; the latter being the stronger consideration, he would bid Two No-Trumps. Over the actual force, however, East has time to "do everything." His first step is a waiting bid of Three Spades.

East's reactions are simple—whatever happens, the bidding is not going to stop short of a slam. West's forcing take-out is based on one of three reasons: an independent suit (or suits) of his own, in which case East's controls will fill in the gaps; fine support for Spades—a rebid by East will reassure West as to the solidity of the trump suit; a balanced hand with a high point count—East's 15 points and length in Spades will be ample for Six No-Trumps at least.

The merit of the Three Spade bid is that East can cope with any development in the auction. In practice West bids Four Clubs; East returns to Four Diamonds and follows with a cue bid of Five Clubs if West's next bid should be Four Hearts or Four Spades. If West raises Three Spades to Four, East has a bid of Five Diamonds (forcing in this sequence) in reserve. Should West bid Three No-Trumps over Three Spades, East can bid a direct Six No-Trumps or temporise with Four Diamonds.

But East succumbed to a peculiar malady already referred to in these notes. Had he been shown the East hand on paper, he would have been the first to condemn the rebid which he selected in practice—an immediate raise of Three Diamonds to Four.

The subsequent events nearly provided a rare feast for the more ghoulish spectators. West bid Four No-Trumps (the Culbertson version, not Blackwood); East could not say Five Diamonds, as a response in the lowest-ranking suit bid by the partnership would deny an Ace,

By M. HARRISON-GRAY

while Six Diamonds would show the said Ace unequivocally but was not justified on his sketchy three-card trump support. So East compromised with the encouraging bid of Five Spades, which West converted to the par call of Six Diamonds.

So far so good. But East was far from happy. Had he really given a good picture of his hand? Could West, for instance, expect to find him on the bidding with a possible key feature such as the doubleton King of Clubs?

East, of course, was tilting at windmills when he thought in terms of missing a grand slam. For the latter to be a reasonable proposition, West needed a good Diamond suit (something rather better than K Q x x x) and primary control of the other three suits. In this case it is charitable to assume that West would have made a grand slam try, himself, since East had suggested a good supporting hand by carrying the bidding to the Four level with his first rebid.

A pause in the proceedings ended with a bid of Six Hearts from East. Somewhat puzzled, West passed back the buck with Six Spades. Coming at such a late stage, West's Spade support could be no better, than A x, so East made a tactical retreat to Six No-Trumps.

There was nothing much wrong with this contract, apart from the fact that Spades had to break 3-3 (this only happens 36 times in 100), not to mention an even money chance that the opponents would run off the first five tricks in Hearts—the declaration, unfortunately, having been placed with West!

Still, all's well that ends well. North held the Ace of Hearts and the Spade suit broke evenly. East gets his cap for Dublin and (we hope) for New York. There is only one thing that worries me—the fabulous "luck" of the Americans.

If our players reach such a contract in New York, it is not even money but a hundred-to-one that the Ace of Hearts will be held by South!

THE ESTATE MARKET

THE CASE OF THE KITCHEN FLOOR

THERE was a time when the ownership of house property was a hall-mark of prosperity. "Oh, he's done all right," a man would remark when assessing the financial circumstances of another; "he owns a row of houses." But that was before 1939, when the Government, in order to prevent unscrupulous landlords from making capital out of the shortage of living accommodation that would follow the expected large-scale aerial bombardment, froze the rents of all houses in the Metropolitan area whose rateable value was less than £100 and all houses elsewhere in England and Wales where the rateable value was less than £150.

At the time this was a wise and necessary piece of legislation; indeed had costs of repairs and maintenance remained at the 1939 level there would have been no valid reason for lifting these restrictions on rent, since, unfortunately, the shortage of houses is just as acute to-day as it was at any time during the war. As it is, costs of repairs and maintenance have risen by approximately 300 per cent. since 1939, and the man who, before the war, was envied as being the owner of a sound investment finds that he has hung a millstone round his neck.

A MATTER FOR PARLIAMENT

TAKE, for example, a case that was decided in the Appeal Court the other day. It concerned a house at Thornton Heath, Surrey, the rent of which is controlled at £45 a year. This house needed a new kitchen floor, and the owner had argued successfully in the county court that the rent was so low that he was not the person having control of the property. So far, so good, but it was a different story when the case came up on the appeal of the Croydon Corporation, for Lord Justice Denning, giving judgment, said that the Court was concerned with the value of the house to the landlord, and if a house was within the Rent Acts, regard must be had to that fact.

"If there was no person having control," he said, "we would get to the absurd position that the Housing Acts would be inoperative in the case of houses within the Rent Acts because there would be no one on whom local authorities could serve the necessary notice."

Parliament, in his opinion, could not have intended any such result, and his conclusion was that the local authority could compel the landlord to do necessary repairs. He added that it was no doubt hard on private landlords that they should be compelled to do repairs at greatly increased cost and not to be allowed to increase rent, but that was a matter for Parliament.

HAMPSHIRE ESTATES FETCH £84,000

TWO Hampshire estates, one of 853 acres, and the other of 282 acres, came up for auction at Winchester the other day and fetched £63,000 and £21,035 respectively. The larger of the two properties, the Bighton Manor estate, is situated a mile or so from Alresford and includes a Queen Anne house, an 18th-century farm-house, 16 cottages and a grain-drier with a storage capacity of approximately 500 tons. The smaller property, the Bishopstoke estate, lies on the north-eastern outskirts of Eastleigh, five miles from Southampton. It includes nearly a mile of trout fishing on the left bank of the River Itchen and was offered by direction of the Bishop of Winchester and the Church Commissioners for England. Messrs. James Harris and Son were the auctioneers in each case.

WITHDRAWN AT £7,500

THIS summer has been noticeable for the fact that a number of agricultural properties have failed to reach their reserves when submitted to auction. The latest example is Billesley Manor, the late Sir Martin J. Melvin's estate of 652 acres, near Stratford-on-Avon, which was withdrawn when the bidding had reached £37,500. Billesley, probably derived from Billing, a tribe of the Varni, and "lea" or "lea," a meadow, is referred to in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicles of 1055 and it is clear that at that time it was a place of considerable size. The existing house dates from Tudor times and incorporates part of an earlier, timber-framed structure, evidence of which is visible in the gallery to the great hall. The property was submitted by Messrs. Edwards, Son and Bigwood and Mathews.

Two other properties that failed to reach their reserves at recent auctions were Tredington Manor, a 16th-century house near Shipston-on-Stour, Worcestershire, and Compton Park, near Amesbury, Wiltshire, which dates from the reign of Charles II. Tredington, however, was sold immediately after the auction by Messrs. Jackson-Stops and Staff (Cirencester) and Messrs. Bosley and Harper, and Messrs. Woolley and Wallis are hopeful of finding a private buyer for Compton Park.

In contrast to the abortive auctions referred to above, there was exceptionally keen bidding when Messrs. Jackson-Stops and Staff's Newmarket Office submitted the Grove, a dairy and arable farm of 296 acres at Banham, Norfolk. The property was eventually knocked down for £25,000, an average of nearly £100 an acre.

SALE AND RE-SALE

THE Ashdale Land and Property Co., which specialises in buying large agricultural estates and then re-selling them, has instructed Messrs. Jackson-Stops and Staff's Cirencester office to auction the Stanley Park estate of 600 acres, near Stroud, Gloucestershire, which they purchased some weeks ago. It is stated that service occupiers will be well looked after by the company in order that no hardship shall take place. The auction is to take place early in October.

A week or two before the auction of Stanley Park, Messrs. Jackson-Stops and Staff's Cirencester office will take part in the auction of another Gloucestershire property, when, with Messrs. Rylands and Co., they submit Donkeywell, a farm of 287 acres which forms part of Earl St. Aldwyn's Williamstrip estate, near Fairford.

6,500 ACRES FOR NATION

THE National Trust has received from the Treasury, through the National Land Fund, about 6,500 acres of the Derwent estate, which lies astride the borders of Yorkshire and Derbyshire some 12 miles to the north-east of Buxton. The land, which formerly belonged to Viscount FitzAlan of Derwent, will be the Trust's largest holding in the Peak District and will safeguard public access to some of its finest moors.

BANK'S NEW HOME

NO. 46, Berkeley Square, built by William Kent and for a long time the London house of the Midway family, has been bought by the Chase National Bank of New York. The property was acquired through Messrs. Jones, Lang, Wootton and Sons, acting on behalf of the British Aluminium Co.

FARMING NOTES

BARLEY PRICES

SOME of the July-cut barley and wheat dried so quickly in the broiling sun that no further treatment was needed. The grain, although harvested before the usual time, carried no more than 15 to 16 per cent. moisture and could safely be bagged for transport to the mills. This was a piece of real luck in a year when we have added 3,000 to the number of combine harvesters without extending our grain-drying capacity correspondingly. If only a quarter of the grain grown in the extensive arable districts of the south can be shifted safely without drying this greatly relieves the burden on the merchants' grain driers. The early barley needed winnowing, as there were some immature grains that would have heated in bulk, and may be the maltsters will pay a rather higher price a little later on than they have offered so far. But I know that a neighbour was glad to accept an offer of 30s. a cwt. for some Pioneer barley that made an attractive sample. I see that the agreement now concluded between the Brewers' Society and the National Farmers' Union makes 120s. a quarter (30s. a cwt.) the minimum price and the maximum is to be 155s. Prices soared last autumn, when there was no agreement between the brewers and the N.F.U., and they would undoubtedly have settled at a modest level this autumn, with so much more barley harvested. It is too early to judge the malting quality of this year's crop. It is likely to be on the steep side because of the intense heat towards the end of last month, and moreover more farmers have this year grown the heavy yielding sorts of barley that do not give a high-grade malting sample. As part of the bargain with the brewers the N.F.U. has given an assurance that every endeavour will be made to encourage farmers to grow better types of barley suitable for malting, and it is hoped that a running price agreement can be continued to stabilise the malting barley market for at least one year ahead. This is surely sound business for both sides.

Farm Ownership

TO satisfy the curiosity of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations British farmers were asked by the Ministry of Agriculture last year to give particulars of the extent to which they were either tenants or owners or a mixture of the two. The returns now published show that about 36 per cent. of holdings were wholly owned by the occupier, 49 per cent. wholly rented and 15 per cent. part-owned and part-rented. The last figures at all comparable were taken in the course of the National Farm Survey in 1941-3. Then it appeared that 66 per cent. of holdings were occupied by tenants compared with 61 per cent. which is the adjusted proportion now. Another interesting figure is the 10,000 holdings out of a total of 256,000 in England and Wales which were reported to be managed by salaried managers. This is only 4 per cent. I should have guessed the proportion higher.

Scottish Wages

ONCE again taking an independent line the Scottish Wages Board has refused to follow the English Board's proposal to increase male farm workers' minimum wages by 5s. a week and women's wages by 4s. The Scottish Board, by a majority consisting of the employers' representatives and the independent members, rejected the proposal on the grounds that no sufficient reasons had been adduced to take action which would increase the cost-of-living. Nor would the Board accept the workers' proposal that the holidays with pay should be increased to 14 days a year. This may create an extraordinary position with labour costs in Scotland being considerably less than in England and Wales. The Scottish Board took note of the fact that the number of general workers in Scotland is only a small and decreasing fraction of the whole and of them only a small proportion are said to receive the basic minimum wage. This, I suspect, is just as true of England and Wales. All credit to the Scottish Agricultural Wages Board for taking their own decision, but I do not imagine that Scottish farmers will forgo whatever increase in produce prices follows higher wages in England and Wales.

Graded Pig Prices

FROM January onwards farmers will be paid for their bacon pigs on the basis of quality as well as weight. This will apply to pigs killing at weights between 7 score lb. and 9 score, and pigs graded "A" will earn an extra 4s. 5d. a score. Grade "B" pigs will earn 3s. a score premium over the grade "C" pigs, which, no doubt, will be those with excessive back fat. There is nothing new in this payment of quality premiums. It was the normal practice with bacon pigs sent to the factories before the war under the contract agreed by the Pigs Marketing Board. A desirable corollary which the Ministry of Food has not yet had the courage to adopt is that the pigs that will grow to fat should be marketable at less than 7 score deadweight for the pork trade. This would happen if demand influenced supply, and housewives do not want fat bacon.

Horses at Sea

WHILE the Minister of Food has been made responsible for general supervision of the arrangements for slaughtering horses, the Minister of Agriculture remains responsible for regulating the carriage of horses by sea both into and from Great Britain. A new Order makes detailed provisions about the fittings of vessels used for carrying horses and lays down rules for the feeding and watering of the animals, both on the voyage and on landing. Some horrible descriptions have been given of the treatment of horses intended for slaughter in Continental countries, and it is all to the good that so far as our own arrangements are concerned we should be scrupulously careful to see that everything is done in the best possible way. A Government Committee is being set up to review the whole problem and probe allegations of mishandling and cruelties. Public opinion will look for a searching enquiry and, indeed, it will largely rest on the public to give the Committee information on which they can base recommendations for strengthening the law. Civil servants in Whitehall cannot be expected to know what goes on in some back-yards.

Meat Salesmanship

HOW many people does it take to produce a steak? This is the question posed by the American Meat Institute of Chicago in its current advertising. It goes on to list 20 who are concerned from the cowboy who looks after the cattle through the banker who finances land, herds and equipment, the chemist who makes insecticides, serums and fertilisers, the steel maker who provides fencing, branding irons and filing cabinets for the farm office, the aeroplane pilot who sprays the fields destroying pests, the truck driver who carries the cattle on their final stage and then the stockyard man, the packer and the retailer. So the American consumer is told: "When you plank the cash on the counter for a sirloin some of it may represent the part you play in getting that steak to your table." CINCINNATUS.

Mayfield, Sussex.

10th March, 1952

"Dear Sirs,
Some two years ago I painted part of my lactory with White 'S.P.E.C.' as a trial because the existing finish did not stand up to the staining caused by dung splashes. You will be interested to hear that your paint is as good today as when it was put on. There are no stains whatsoever and the surface is as good as new in spite of daily washings.

Last year I painted my new calf house throughout with 'S.P.E.C.' using my own unskilled labour and I am very proud of the immaculate appearance of this house.

Yours faithfully,

This letter from a Sussex farmer is one of many which prove the practical advantages of SILEXINE Plastic Emulsion Coating. This revolutionary wall surfacing material is being extensively used for milking parlours, dairies and cowsheds. Farmers find it cheaper and better to maintain a clean, hygienic wall surface by hosing down a S.P.E.C. finish than by continual limewashing. S.P.E.C. gives a perfect, protective finish to old or new concrete, plaster or brickwork. It dries in one hour and after seventy-two hours can be pressure hosed or scrubbed without the slightest damage to its surface.

Send for full details and colour chart. We shall also be pleased to send particulars of SILEXINE STONE PAINT, the ideal protective and decorative finish for exterior walls.

VERMEER'S STRANGE PAINTINGS

Reviews by GEOFFREY GRIGSON

ALL of us—at least in reproduction—know some paintings by Johannes Vermeer. Everything is still, clear, and yet remote. A girl in blue reads a letter, a girl has her music lesson, a girl stands at the virginals. Everything is exquisite. No violence, no drama—on the surface. Here, it looks, is the beau-ideal of simple and subtle record, no Picasso stuff (or Michelangelo stuff, either); nothing to upset the gentle, the casual, the placid admirers of things as they are or seem to be. Yet those who read and look through Professor Lawrence Gowing's Vermeer girl weighing out gold, the girl interrupted at her music. Whom are these letters from? What is in them? What services have been given for the gold? Of what kind are these situations, even the ones which seem innocent in the quick glance most of us give to paintings?

Clues are there for interpretation; and yet there is that strange neutrality of Vermeer's, the strange fact that his girls, for all his interest in the open expressiveness of their features or their actions, might either be virtuous or lascivious. "I don't care," the artist might be stating with his pigments (Faber, 50s.) will discover how odd fish moved under the calm surfaces, will find even a detective story.

There is nothing to go by except the paintings, a good situation. Of Vermeer it is known that he lived from 1632 to 1672. Little else. He was not rich or greatly successful, he married, he left 11 children. Everything, almost, of the painter's emotions has to be discovered from the handful of paintings—or, to put it another way, there are no adventitious clues in letters, statements, or biographical material of any kind. Is it worth looking at all deep, is Vermeer just an eye? Or did the eye lead to a mind, to peculiar feelings, to a view of life? First of all, did Vermeer have any special regard for human beings? None at all, you might reply. Each figure, each young woman, is a cool piece of furniture poised in light and space along with the virginals, the leather-backed chair, the squared floor, the window and the wall and the picture on the wall. Each figure is a mere element inside an hallucinated vision of remoteness and actuality. There is so much in these paintings, says Professor Gowing, of an "inhuman fineness of temper," so much "impeccable consistency," so much that is "neutral," "reticent" and "secretive."

WHAT IS CONCEALED?

But if Johannes Vermeer was secretive, what did he conceal or work into this faultless vision of faultless Dutch interiors? Even more than Professor Gowing allows, the subjects give an answer. They are not all of them quite so innocent or savoury. The Procuress—gallants and a young girl, wineglass in one hand, the other held out for the coin. The Soldier and a Laughing Girl. The Girl Drinking with a Gentleman. The girl reading a letter at the window, the pregnant girl in blue reading a letter, the woman with a lute receiving a love letter, the

"for these women as women. Here I give you cool Delft interiors and music and the clean refinements of living; here is the human society. No doubt men and women, inside—and particularly women—are often neither cool, refined, clean nor virtuous. Take it or leave it: it is no matter to me. If I have a wife and 11 children, if this girl reading a letter might act in a pastoral or act (as she is doing) by the flesh, though I recognize this human comedy of contrasts, I reject it. Saints or bawds, Sunday-school teachers or courtesans, praise or condemnation, are not my concern. My consolation and my interest are in sight, in tones, in space, illumination, order; these alone are innocent and immutable."

INHUMAN ARTIST

In the Netherlands, just before Vermeer's day, there was a painter more obviously mysterious, more lonely, yet less enigmatic, and wholly involved in the human concern. This Hercules Seghers designed wild and dead landscapes, lunar rocks, blasted trees, gaunt expanses of a human mis-en-scène which is no earthly paradise. But his attitude is explicit. In his glum wilderness, a church, a village, a few squared and cultivated fields, a figure or two, points to the human value within the human tragedy. Seghers is an artist of humanity, both of acceptance and protest. Vermeer, if Professor Gowing is right (though I have exaggerated his explanation and grossly simplified it), sticks out as an artist surprisingly inhuman. He is a perfectionist of sensation, a unique kind of demon outside good and evil, a cut-throat of all tenderness except of light, tone and order. Pictures are not always what they seem. Painting can be an art as subtle and as full of meaning as the novelist's art or the poet's; but we should not always guess that from the way in which it is treated by the race of commentators. Professor Gowing appears to me to have analysed Vermeer with a combination of scholarship, keenness and openness far beyond the plodding of most art history and art criticism.

ART AND CRAFT

Art and craft are frequently different things. If one may admire the engraved goblets of Mr. Laurence Whistler, so pleasantly illustrated and pleasantly described by the craftsman himself in The Engraved Glass of Laurence Whistler (Cupid Press, 63s.), as well to remember that craft and good taste (to which Vermeer went as near as an artist may go with safety) have their small limits. I imagine that Mr. Whistler dislikes the rough complexity of existence and postulates for himself a neat, serene world like a Dutch interior, or rather a miniature world of the ladies of Fragonard and Boucher. Neat engravings, neat poems, neat grace. More than most craftsmen hedged by the mass manufacture of objects, Mr. Whistler is in difficulties. He must have, as he painfully discovered, the right glass, of which none seems better than "the gentlest of old blown glass with plenty of lead in the composition." So much of his work has been engraved around old goblets, bottles and decanters. Old shapes appropriate to a certain time, and not to the present, demand equivalent decoration, though obviously Mr. Whistler is also drawn by temperament out of the present and into the past. This means that he produces—even more than the studio potter who begins with the raw clay on his wheel—a kind of neo-antique, a craftsman's pastiche of delicacy and taste.

Fascinating to read how Mr. Whistler has come, inch by inch, from the scratching of window-panes to the intricacy and discipline of designs on a Georgian rummer or tankard, learning his glass and his instruments. He finished one Georgian goblet and washed it in cold water. A piece of the foot snapped away. Afterwards he discovered how this old glass in the making had been too quickly cooled. There was an inner layer of tension, an outer skin of compression. His diamond point broke through the outer skin, the compression was gone, and the disaster followed.

Mr. Whistler's work is so skilful, and can so provide the unique object that it seems a pity not to join it to living design. Working with an artist, to an artist's ideas, this fine craftsman could turn the considerable charm of pastiche into a charm altogether more energetic and durable. At present it is too like a Vermeer deserting his own time to make variations on Botticelli.

MEANING OF U.S.A.

Vermeer's Delft, Mr. Whistler's Georgian England, Mr. Eisenhower's America. They meet, no doubt, in the vast collections of the Du Pont museum outside Wilmington, on the walls of the National Gallery at Washington or the Art Institute at Chicago. But what of the United States outside the temples or reservations of culture, a block or two away from a Vermeer or a Georgian goblet? In The Permanent Revolution (Heinemann, 18s.) the editors of Fortune and Mr. Russell W. Davenport try to interpret to doubters or unbelievers the "meaning of the U.S.A." In America's Man of Destiny (Heinemann, 12s. 6d.), Mr. Kevin McCann interprets, to an audience perhaps more ready to listen, the meaning of that peculiar man whom we may perhaps have to call President Eisenhower.

What would happen if all the nations of the world colonised the moon? A rise from old cultures of a different culture, bizarrely (from our point of view) adapted to lunar peculiarities. In some points a fossilisation, and in some points an adaptation, or a new growth, of old habits of mind, old attitudes. A degree of incomprehension also between moon men and earth men, such as persists between Europe and the U.S. The editors of Fortune are skilful expositors. They present America, not as a community, but as a frame for communities, an excellent point since it is a viable frame for communities which the world needs. They explain the standardisation which repels the European, more or less as another frame, this time for the freedom of the individual—outer standardisation, inner freedom. They claim that American capitalism is altogether different from European capitalism, that it has been transformed, or has evolved "into the belief that ownership carries social obligations, and that a manager is a trustee not only for the owner but for society as a whole." They explain American politics. They tackle the notion that Americans are barbarian and the U.S. "a dehumanising technocracy."

DRAB SURFACE

In this last job they are deplorably weak, not in self-criticism, but in misunderstanding the Europe they wish to convert. "Americanisation" is a convenient Aunt Sally. What we often mean when we take a shy at this battered phiz is simply that America has widened and exaggerated tendencies we already distrust and dislike in our own society. One of these tendencies has been explained admirably as a revolt of the mediocre—that mediocrity, in all classes and for the first time in the history of man, has demanded in all affairs, cultural ones included, the first word and the last. It is a question of whether democracy means raise or lower. True, there are outward and inward Americas. The visiting European—or this particular reviewer, lately invited to see and travel and presumably to make up his mind—finds an American surface inconceivably drab by his own standards, untidy, dirty, raw, graceless, ruthless, everlastingly in transition from one dump to the next, and unmodified by the checks that monuments of time and tradition place upon his own environment. He does not like it; and he may overlook that the very blatancy of America produces so much of the opposite virtues, in a range from the brilliance of the New Yorker to the direct decency he has seen and liked in Mr. Eisenhower.

A GOODNESS TO ADMIRE

Mr. Kevin McCann's book is not a life, so much as a sketch of Mr. Eisenhower's development and opinions. In fact, the decency and modesty of this man act as a far more persuasive export than some of the fossilised and polished convictions of the editors of Fortune. No doubt, by our notions there are fossils of outmoded ideas in Eisenhower's mind. But when he says that America's best foreign policy should be her own example of daily lives conducted "in honesty, decency and integrity," or speaks of how Americans should behave in every crisis, real or counterfeit, how they should resist propaganda and passion, and how they should be ready "to seek adjustment and compromise of difference," then a goodness not confined to this one man out of a small town in Kansas and not contradicted by beer advertisements on television, witch-hunting senators and income-tax frauds can be recognised, admired and trusted.

THE sleekly fitted coat is in a distinct minority in the autumn collections. It is the coat that falls from the shoulders to hem in flares, but with no exaggerated fullness, that is an easy favourite, and on many the impact of a new and casual look is most marked. The coats mainly feature deep-cut armholes, some have a belt slung low below the waist, and all show a generally blurred and softened outline. The clean-cut crisp silhouette is reserved for the minority, the facecloths and other firm, smooth fabrics. This new look has been created by various "poodle" cloths, by pile woollens, bouclé tweeds and lightweight woollens of an exceedingly flexible nature. The soft limp folds and rather sloppy look to the tops of these coats are becoming over the slender sheaths of day dresses.

Collars are inconspicuous save in a few instances where the designer goes to the other extreme and shows a waist-length cape collar, often detachable and often in fur or fur fabric. By far the greater majority of the coats possess narrow rolled collars, mere continuations of the fronts and back of the coat itself, or the neatest of turndown collars. This allows for great play with cravats, mufflers, tippets, scarves or fur pieces, and many novelties have appeared to cope with the situation. Three-tiered velvet tippets have been shown by Starke, angora tasselled scarves by Dorville, plaid wool mufflers and cravats of loosely knitted narrow ribbon.

The deep diamond-cut armhole is a favourite, though many versions of the raglan sleeve have also appeared among the winter coats. Yokes bring a horizontal line to both backs and fronts, breaking the top of the coats. Enormous pockets are often inset into the front of coats below the waist and then carried right round with a horizontal double seam. Everything, in fact, tends to reverse the process of the last few years when pockets were inset vertically and the closely fitting coats were seamed from top to bottom and flared to the full hemlines.

The fur-trimmed coat has appeared with the alterations in the purchase tax scheme; hitherto the tax has been prohibitive and the fur-trimmed coat was well in the background as an expensive luxury. Comparatively inexpensive cloth coats with either fur collars or fur cuffs have been included in each wholesale collection and many women who have had to do without for many years will find them a refreshing change. The flat inexpensive furs such as beaver and krimmer lamb, squirrel and mole are the favourites, with some blue fox. There is a most realistic ocelot fur fabric on the market that has been shown a great deal for whole coats, for scarves on tweed coats and for linings, and some charming velour coats in either a dim deep blue or olive green are adorned by a simple turndown collar of beaver lamb or blue fox. Bird's-eye tweeds in mixed greens and browns or showing a dark brown background woven with minute multi-coloured flecks have either the collar in cloth and a fur tie for a decoration or a neat collar in the fur and sometimes a fur lining as well. A great deal of black with brown fur appears this year, as last, and the grey furs are making a bid to oust the browns—silver grey squirrel for curly lamb, silver-blue mink for the more luxurious.

Tweeds and woollens woven with occasional lines of irregular curly mohair or bouclé that make a thick raised stripe or fine checks are excellent for a coat that has to do duty in either town or country. The fabric is light and warm and looks well in black or mushroom brown, while attractive colour mixtures have been introduced. Dereta call their series "bubble" tweeds and the pale multi-coloured flecks glimmer against the dim brown or grey backgrounds. The bouclé yarn is woven into broken stripes and plaids, and the whole effect is very charming. The black ribbed woollen of the Alexon jacket photographed is the prototype of many in the winter collections. The fabric is light and warm; the coat loose and casual-looking with deep armholes and a cosy wrapover front, while the small collar can stand up or be turned down.

THE loose-looking jacket clutched closely round the hips with a reed-slim skirt is in all the wholesale collections in a variety of tweeds and soft textured woollens. It is smartest of all perhaps in a broken plaid or boldly flecked woollen in two or three colours, when it will be teamed with a plain dark skirt. Much the same line is shown on many of the woollen dresses when the softly folded bodice with deep armholes and high plain neckline all tend to make the tight plain skirts look even shorter and tighter than they actually are. On other day dresses the midriff is moulded as sleekly as the hipline with soft folds above and generally a high neckline creating the suspicion of a higher Empire waistline. On others, the middie line is favoured where the top and basque are simple and clinging as sweaters.

After the London and Paris couturier collections there are bound to be other changes, but for the moment the line is set and the first wholesale collections have already been ordered from the buyers, and the clothes are in production. On the vital question of the stiffened petticoat, the designers are compromising in the main, retaining it for the cocktail dresses and mostly showing slender moulded skirts for day dresses and suits.

The London milliners concentrate on close neat little berets and bonnets for their first autumn designs, but also show a number of felts of the vagabond family. The larger brims that dip either side of the forehead suit many women; indeed they have always been worn here in the country. Smart Parisiennes now favour these hats for wearing in town in pale colours with their dark sleek suits and short, sleek hair styles. One of the newest versions shown by O to Lucas possesses a deep ribbon band cut into scallops at the bottom following the undulations on the brim. In contrast to the tiny half hats perched on top that disclose most of the hairline and give not an atom of shade, this type of hat seems enormous. But it is really only a medium size and looks smart with the shorter, tighter skirts and the jackets with their deep easy armholes and soft-looking shoulder treatment.

Minute half hats re-appear as some most attractive bonnets in pliable velours with a soft fluffy surface. Debenham and Freebody show them folded back from the face, Napoleonic in line, as well as others that close over the head and cover the ears, leaving the hair on the forehead and the nape of the neck uncovered. The fabric is so soft that it can be moulded to the head and is delightfully light to wear. Small cloche hats in satin or panne are made with dipping brims and jewelled bands.

A backward movement is launched by Simone Mirman. Her small hats cling to the head and are wider from side to side than from back to front. Then two stiff ears of ribbon or felt project from the back. She continues the close-fitting caps with peaks or little haloes on top to raise them and places them on a rim of velvet laid all round the base. Flat velvet half hats curve over the head and down over the ears, and they, too, will often rest on a skull cap of velvet so that they are in two layers over the forehead.

Edward Harvane makes his tiny hats considerably higher and gives all of them a brim, even if it is only a half-inch brim. They fit right over the hair. Cocktail hats in fur fabric are worn well on the back of the head, and have practically no brim back and front, but wide wings either side. Dome-shaped caps of folded velvet or silk jersey are given a complete globe on top, about half the size of the cap and also entirely in the closely folded fabric. This is the shape that Dorville are featuring in angora jersey with a ball of the jersey on top matched by wide scarves caught by a ball either end. An excellent country felt from Lincoln Bennett is the classic shape with a narrow brim and a crown that fits on well for a windy day. It is different because of a neat decoration, a line of felt thonged across the crown from back to front.

Yes, indeed!

for MAGNIFICENT MOTORING

Performance figures for the Riley 2½ litre are impressive by any standards. They tell a story of flashing acceleration and a maximum of over 100 m.p.h. But they cannot describe the quality of the distinctive, individually built Riley.

They cannot tell you how engine, steering, suspension, brakes and even body, all blend to give Riley character.

Owning and driving a Riley are two of the fine pleasures that words cannot express.

Scene reconstructed by Roy Carr

EARLY IN THE 1890's, Commander Henry Bradwardine Jackson — knowing nothing of the work of Marconi — first conceived the idea that torpedo boats might announce their approach to a capital ship by the use of wireless waves. In 1895, in the torpedo-school ship 'Defiance' at Devonport, he began secret experiments on Admiralty instructions. Before the end of the year he had succeeded in transmitting, from one end of the ship, signals of sufficient intensity to ring an electric bell in the receiving circuit at the other. After meeting Marconi, who first visited England the following summer, he went rapidly ahead with the evolution of naval wireless telegraphy, making vital contributions to the development of world communications. The tempo of modern life has certainly quickened since 1895, when Albert E. Reed first developed the production of super-calendered newsprint.

In the reclaimed straw paper mill he had acquired the previous year, his first machines produced but six cwt. of paper an hour. Compare with this the six tons an hour reeled off the modern high-speed machines in the great Aylesford mills of the Reed Paper Group — their continually-expanding production including newsprint, kraft and tissue papers. For to-day the Reed Paper Group with its great resources and technical experience is one of the largest paper-making organisations in the world.
